KRYSTALLOS | Gift store expected to re-open in June completion date was in June.

Although Robert Eichman of project subcontractor company Midwest Concrete Materials said he did not know when construction was scheduled to finish, it could take longer than four months.

"There is quite a lot of work. It can take a year to finish all this," Eichman said.

Rose said her business will have twice the amount of room as it did before the fire, a new interior, as well as new merchandise.

"We have been buying new and exciting stuff," Rose said. "We have a designer line of jewelry that we make ourselves, so we'll have that, too. There will be neat new things and a new look, but we'll still specialize in gemstones, sterling silver, clothing and gifts."

The May fire was the third to claim an Aggieville businesses in the last 16 years. In 1987, a fire destroyed Westron Wynde Music Shoppe, 1200 Moro St.

Eleven years later, in 1998, flames wiped out four Aggieville businesses, including Club Karington, Greek's Pizzeria, Speed Wash and Advantage Travel. The total damage amounted to $1 million.

"Aggieville might have a little higher change-over in restaurants and bars than other parts of town, but retail and other businesses have been there for many, many years," said Lyle Butler, president of Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

Ron Bramlage, owner of the building, could not be reached for comment.

suburb of Saydiya on Sunday afternoon and found him on the second floor, Ibrahim said. Abdul Razaq offered no resistance.

If al-Douri turns himself in, "he will be treated with dignity," Ibrahim said. Al-Douri, the former vice chairman of the ruling Revolutionary Command Council and a member of Saddam's innermost circle, is No. 6 on the U.S. most-wanted list.

Earlier Sunday, two U.S. convoys were attacked simultaneously in the same western neighborhood in Baghdad. A roadside bomb went off by one of the convoys, causing no injuries. But the soldiers opened fire, killing one Iraqi driver nearby and wounding six others, one of the wounded and hospital officials said.

Nearby, gunmen opened fire on another convoy, hitting a civilian Sports Utility Vehicle. The U.S. command reported no casualties, but witnesses reported seeing three wounded foreigners being taken from the vehicle.

In Qaim, near the Syrian border about 200 miles northwest of Baghdad, U.S. troops backed by tanks and Bradley fighting vehicles clashed Sunday with Iraqi gunmen, but there was no report of casualties.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have blamed Saddam loyalists and foreign Islamic fighters infiltrating Iraq for the persistent campaign of attacks on American forces and their Iraqi allies. But pinpointing which guerrillas are behind individual attacks has proven difficult.

The stunning attack in Fallujah on Saturday was no exception.

"There were foreigners apparently involved. We're still looking into that to try to find out what the implications are," he told ABC's "This Week" program.

Two of at least four gunmen killed in the gunbattle had Lebanese identification papers, according to Fallujah police. Some policemen said they heard attackers speaking a language other than Arabic, perhaps Farsi.

But a U.S. military officer in Baghdad said the attack's sophistication pointed to former high-ranking Saddam military officers.

"It was a complex, well-coordinated attack. This would not be the same tactics that al-Qaeda would employ. These are military tactics," he said on condition of anonymity.

Club, she will be able to use one of the club's aircraft to do her traveling.

The corporation owns and operates five aircraft and strives to maintain about 13 active members per airplane. About 50 percent of the club's membership is made up of K-State students. The rest are K-State alumni.

"Flying is really cool, and it gives you a new point of view on the landscape," Ornelas said. "If I could give any advice, I'd tell a prospective student to make sure he or she have enough time to do it. It's hard to improve if you don't practice regularly."

But a lack of time and money, along with a range of rumors about student health centers, keep some students from obtaining medical assistance.

"Student health centers have a poor reputation among those who haven't used them," said Melissa Smith, manager of the health education department at Watkins Memorial Health Center at the University of Kansas. "One student mistakenly hears that someone went in with a broken leg and was diagnosed with mono, and it spreads like wildfire."

Barry said she agrees student health care is a common complaint on college campuses.

"Every campus is the same way," she said. "Students tend to complain about the food in the residence halls and the health care."

"Lafene is one of the few student health centers that is fully accredited," Barry said. "We know we're not perfect, but we have very qualified physicians and staff who are very committed and really enjoy working with students."

"I'm very satisfied with the care I received at Lafene," Sonia Garcia, junior in music education, said. "It's convenient and costs less than going somewhere else."

Trusting Lafene's services, however, is still an issue for others.

"They gave me medicine for my backache, but they never told me what was wrong," Beth Plummer, junior in family studies, said. "I probably won't go back unless it's my last resort."

Problems can arise when students put off treating a medical problem that could be life-threatening.

"It's dangerous for students to avoid seeking medical assistance until the last possible moment," said Carol Kennedy, health promotion and nutrition counseling director. "I think students are pleasantly surprised when they find out that Lafene provides quality care."

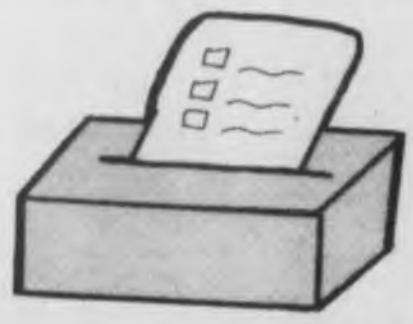
"If a student has a complaint, we would much rather hear from the student directly and address the problem than have them unsatisfied and tell others about their bad experience," Kennedy said.



About two-thirds of the student body utilizes the services provided by Lafene each semester.

"I can't envision not having a health center in place for students," Barry said. "We want students to come here, and we want to provide them with quality care."

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan – India and Pakistan held their first peace talks in 2 1/2 years Monday, praising a "new momentum" and working on a timetable to resolve decades of conflict between the nuclear-armed neighbors over Kashmir, terrorism and other issues.

As the two countries back down from the brink of their fourth war in 2002, the three-day talks are to lay the groundwork for ending a half-century of tension since their 1947 partition.

"There is realization in India and Pakistan that war is not an option, that you have to look at ways to find a peaceful resolution of the outstanding disputes between the two countries," Pakistani spokesman Masood Khan said after a meeting between Foreign Ministry officials of the two countries.

"There's new momentum; this momentum must be maintained," he said.

The two sides discussed dates for future talks, and a formal timetable was expected to be decided over the next two days. The talks include discussions on eight issues, including Kashmir, confidence-building measures in the nuclear field, terrorism and drugs, economic cooperation and a river dispute.

"I am quite optimistic over the outcome of this round of talks," Yashwant Sinha, the Indian foreign minister, said in New Delhi.

The rapprochement was started by Indian Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee and Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, who agreed to resume the dialogue last month. At a July 2001 summit in Agra, India failed to make any progress.

Jalil Abbas Jilani, a director-general in Pakistan's Foreign Ministry, and Arun Kumar Singh, a joint secretary in India's External Affairs Ministry, shook hands and smiled before the start of the Monday meeting. The talks run through Wednesday, culminating in a face-to-face between the countries'

The chill factor

Cold weather affects body in different ways

RUNNY NOSE

The nose will run on a cold day because the air inside the nose is warmer than the air outside. Water condenses in the nose, mixes with mucus and drips out of the nose.

Source: www.sciencenet.org

PINK CHEEKS

When skin cells in the cheeks react to cold temperatures they retain moisture, which causes the cells to freeze and turn the familiar reddish color.

A dull white coloring after being exposed to cold may indicate the beginning stages of frostbite.

BLUISH HANDS

When the body starts to become cold, it will try to conserve body heat in the core of the body near the organs.

Extremities will be the first areas to lose circulation. The hands will grow colder and they will appear to be less pink and almost bluish in tint.

IMPROPER LAYERING

Layering clothing can aid in keeping the body warm.

However, there are certain ways of layering that should be considered. Layering with cotton is helpful because it allows the body to breathe and prevents sweating, which can cause a person to lose heat.

Avoid thick layers which can produce sweating.

Source: Kathy Dickey, clinic supervisor of Riley County Health Department

SHIVERING

The hypothalamus will then send a message back to the muscles and cause them to shiver to make heat.

The heat produced from shivering is similar to the heat produced from exercising because the muscle movement in both situations cause an increase in body temperature.

GOOSEBUMPS

Goosebumps are a trait leftover from prehistoric times when humans had long hair all over their bodies and needed it to keep warm.

When the muscles at the base of the hairs are relaxed, the hair lies flat. When the muscles contract and form goosebumps, the hairs stand up. In this position, they can trap more air, which insulates the skin. Fur bearing animals still use this method to keep warm.

Fake permits cause problems for Parking Services

By Kerry Fischer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students easily can see them on cars – the little yellow envelopes wedged between the windshield and the wiper that contain parking citations.

But for some students, a way out of a parking citation is as easy as forging a parking permit.

"I'd probably be too scared to do it," Sarah Zamaitis, freshman in anthropology, said. "It's easy to get caught."

Forged parking permits are not that common on campus, but Parking Services does see a few fake permits occasionally, said Jeff Barnes, safety and security manager for parking services.

Permit forgery, he said, is getting easier with the new technology available.

What students forget, however, are the fines involved in getting caught with a forged parking permit.

The person who forged the permit may also be banned from parking on campus for a year.

Barnes said it is relatively easy for Parking Services personnel to spot fake permits.

Did you know?
Parking stalls

- Total number of stalls on campus: 10,300
- Total number of student stalls: 3,000 (includes "R" students)
- Total number of general stalls: 2,000
- Total number of faculty/staff stalls: 1,900

Such permits change color in the sunlight, or there is something about the permit appearance that does not look right.

Barnes said the most common type of permit forgery is where students buy a semester permit, which has the lower right corner missing, and try to tape or glue on the right corner to make it look like a yearlong permit.

As a security measure, Parking Services changes the style of their permits every year, as well as put bar codes on the backs of the permits and holographic tape on the front.

Barnes said illegal car registration is a much more common circumstance.

Students who live in the residence halls will fill out the registration form for an "O" permit so they can park on

READERS' REPRESENTATIVE FOR THE COLLEGIAN

Working in spotlight can be tough

There you are, sitting in class getting ready to hand in that paper that hours ago you thought would never get done. But now your confidence is raised since you got it done hours before deadline and had a chance to proofread it several times.

Calmly you pull your typed and stapled paper out of your bag, only to notice there on the front page, plain as day, is a typo.

AMY LINK
Amy can be reached at aml7555@k-state.edu

You swear and wonder how you possibly could not see this– and then frustration sinks in as there is no way to correct it now.

Journalists know this feeling all too well.

On Feb. 11, the Collegian published that Design Intelligence had given a third-place ranking to K-State's interior architecture program. This was incorrect since the ranking was given to interior design and interior architecture, which are grouped together for the ranking but separate programs at K-State.

Those outside of the interior design program might think it's not that big of a deal. But it is.

This is what is so frustrating, for every correction that was written, there were countless other mistakes that were avoided thanks to journalists checking their facts again and again, and copy editors double-checking the reporters.

However, readers have the right to criticize the newspaper's credibility when names are misspelled or information is not accurate. Often, many of you call in to make the error known to the staff, and that is a service to us.

The Collegian staff, like all newspaper staffs, hate to write corrections, and many times journalists are hurt by the criticism they must endure for their thankless jobs. This can prompt the staff to be defensive when remarks are made about the accuracy of the stories.

For instance, reporters would love to tell the person with the complaint about the deadline constraints that were placed on them when writing the story. Or to tell them how easy it can be to misunderstand what a source says, or how an editor can make a change that creates an error, and how sometimes it was the source who gave the wrong information. Not to mention that the Collegian staff are students just like you.

However, reporters know their bylines are not just for credit, they are for accountability.

By placing their name on an article, reporters are signing a contract with readers that the information they're putting out there is accurate.

Thus, when they don't honor the contract, readers have the right to let them know.

The Collegian may not always be perfect, but journalists can try harder to be accurate. When we do make an error, let us know, so we can be accurate, even if it is a little late.

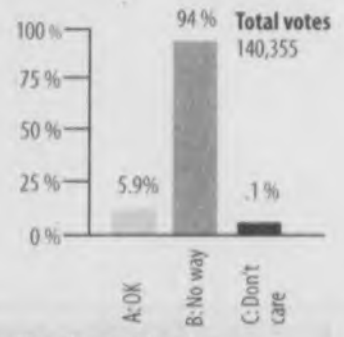
Should Kansas legalize same-sex marriages?

News update
Timeline of gay marriage debate

FEB. 4
The Massachusetts high court ruled that only full, equal marriage rights for gay couples, rather than civil unions, are constitutional, clearing the way for the nation's first same-sex marriages in the state as early as May.

Despite the court's decision, legislators who opposed the concept were weighing options to try to circumvent the ruling — either through a law or a constitutional amendment.



FEB. 11
After six hours of debate, Massachusetts lawmakers defeated a constitutional amendment that would have defined marriage as a union between one man and one woman but allowed for civil unions between same-sex couples.

The legislators also narrowly rejected a second amendment that would have banned same-sex marriage altogether.

FEB. 12
Massachusetts lawmakers returned to the Statehouse in search of the magic mix of words necessary to approve a ban on gay marriage, a day after killing two compromise proposals that would have offered the possibility of civil unions.

Later that day, the legislature suspended debate on the proposal after two days of negotiations, the slim defeat of three amendments and an angry walkout by lawmakers chanting "We want a vote."

The constitutional convention will resume March 11 when lawmakers will again grapple with the divisive issue that has placed Massachusetts in the national spotlight.

Construction on the new apartment complex, Founders Hill, continues. The apartments will be ready to lease as early as June.

New apartment complex to offer more student housing

By Jessica Grant
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As K-State continues to grow, the city of Manhattan must compensate for its student population.

Part of this compensation comes in the form of housing, such as the new apartment complex under construction west of campus near Chase Manhattan Apartments.

The new complex, named Founders Hill, is owned by First Management Inc., which also owns Chase Manhattan Apartments, Woodway Apartments, and Campus East Apartments.

Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said the new complexes are a response to the increasing number of students.

"The number of the student body is increasing, particularly in the last 12 years," Butler said. "As those numbers increase, there is more demand for housing. There is a need for more housing, and this is an opportunity to meet that need."

Founders Hill will be a complex that contains one-, two-, three- and four-bedroom units.

Some of the apartments' features are carpeting, ceramic tiling, self-cleaning ovens, appliances, full size washers and dryers in every unit, nine-foot ceilings, fans in the living room and every bedroom, and concierge service.

The concierge service will include such amenities as arranging dinner reservations, making reservations for visiting families at area hotels and dry cleaning services.

The concierge also can water plants when the residents are gone.

There will be a maid service and a convenience store located on its premises. Founders Hill will also be pet friendly.

With its many luxuries catering to students and its location near campus, other complexes like Chase Manhattan Apartments might be in for some competition.

"There will be some competition between Chase Manhattan and Founders Hill, but it will be friendly competition," Wilson said. "This is internal because we are currently renting out of the same office".

Donna Walker, property manager for McCullough Development Inc., said there probably would not be much competition between her complex and Founders Hill.

"We offer prime location for our buildings and our prices cater to more students," she said.

Founders Hill has an estimated completion date of late spring, Wilson said. Some of the apartments might be available for lease as early as June.

The apartments currently are at about 75 percent vacancy, but Wilson said the units are filling up quickly.

"There is definitely a need for more student housing in Manhattan, and we are just trying to accommodate that need," Wilson said.

Trisha Meili, known as the Central Park Jogger, is a former investment banker with dual master's degrees from Yale University. Meili was raped while jogging in New York City's Central Park on April 19, 1989.
Why you should go
Meili has a powerful story to tell about her infamous experience.

A little about Trisha Meili

Meili suffered brain damage, lost three-fourths of her blood and spent two weeks in a coma as a result of the attack.

Four teenagers were arrested and sent to prison for the crime, even though genetic evidence failed to prove it was them. A prisoner serving time later admitted and was linked to the crime. The sentences of the teens were thrown out.

Meili now travels the country spreading her message of hope and recovery.

Meili originally chose not to reveal her identity, but later decided she owed it to others with similar experiences to tell her story and to inspire others into recovery.

By Gary Nap
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aggieville Mini-Mart, an establishment located in Manhattan for the past 35 years, closed its doors forever at 3 p.m. Friday.

Chuck Schimpf, a Mini-Mart employee since 1978 and owner of the Mini-Mart since June 1999, said the city's transformation of Aggieville to a series of one-way streets is what led to the closing.

"They took the convenience out of my convenience store," Schimpf said.

By making Laramie one-way, anyone traveling west of City Park had to pass two convenience stores to get to the Mini-Mart. Once this happened, Schimpf saw a decline in his business.

"I should have closed a year ago," Schimpf said.

Schimpf tried to keep his business going while sales dwindled. On Feb. 5, however, he decided to close his doors for good.

"I decided it on a Thursday, told my employees on Friday," he said.

A week later, the convenience store closed.

"It's sad to see them close.

I went in there a lot of times after going out," said Nick Fertig, senior in radio and television, who lives near the Mini-Mart.

While some students and local citizens are upset at the closing, others just see it as losing one of their options.

On the east side of campus, there is Quick Cats in Van Zile Hall's basement or the Moore Hall convenience store located in the lobby.

For students not on campus there are convenience stores located all over Manhattan.

Loretta Bunck, senior in biology, said she buys most of her snacks from Dillons.

"Snacks are a luxury," Rick Mandracchia, junior in education, said. "After spending all of your money on necessities, you just can't find money for snacks."

The leaders of Pakistan and India finally are taking the much-needed first steps toward harmony between their two countries by starting peace talks this month.

A main source of strife between the two countries has been over control of the Himalayan province of Kashmir. The argument over control of Kashmir brought the two countries to the brink of war in 2002.

An instrumental part of the talks between Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Shri Atal Bihari Vajpayee is the promise on both sides to crack down on the militants and zealots who have been the source of horrendous attacks on both countries. Now, instead of one government blaming the other, Musharraf and Vajpayee will cut out the middle man and bring these fundamentalists to justice.

President Bush can play an integral role in the growth of these peace talks simply by voicing his support of the effort and allowing the two leaders to spearhead the process themselves.

The United States has been known to side with India in its disputes with Pakistan, and for Bush to show favoritism to any side could lead to disaster.

What would Jesus do?

Left-wing radicals continue Jesus' legacy

BARBARA MEYER

While campaigning for the 2000 elections, our president declared, to the delight of Christian conservatives, that Jesus was his "favorite political philosopher."

In my attempts to discover exactly what kind of politics Jesus was preaching, I came to a startling conclusion: conservatives must not actually read the Bible.

That's because Jesus of Nazareth was a liberal if ever one was allowed in the church: hair down to there, long robes, and you can bet your Volkswagen that he was sporting Birkenstocks.

How would Jesus' political ideas translate into our own society? For starters is the ironic symbolism of Jesus' choice of wheels.

On his final trip into Jerusalem to make what would become the ultimate sacrifice for mankind, Jesus rejected potential endorsement deals with Elephants-R-Us and opted to take a sturdy donkey instead.

The reaction of the local people to his teachings is also a dead give away. The right-wing religious groups repeatedly tried to imprison and kill him.

When it came to partying, Jesus wasn't hanging out at the country club with the Yale men. He was keeping the wine flowing at weddings and feeding loaves and fishes to thousands.

His ideas on capitalism would have done Marx proud. On one occasion he even chased money changers and merchants out of the temple for taking advantage of people.

I'd like to see how he would have handled Halliburton and Enron.

The disciples followed Jesus' economic example as well, and "no one claimed that any of his possessions was his own, but they shared everything they had," Acts 4:32.

Of course, free love was another story. His advocacy of gouging out one's eye for looking lustfully at a woman pretty much says it all.

But far from promoting hysteria over hot-button issues like gay marriage or abortion, Jesus warned against judging others.

In fact, he even refused to condemn a woman caught in the act of a capital offense. In the face of clear guilt, he stuck to his philosophy of "Let he who has not sinned cast the first stone."

Attention Texas: that means you.

Like the hippies of modern America, Jesus rejected an eye for an eye and instead favored a policy of turning the other cheek and loving thine enemies.

That puts him squarely with the United Nations on the issue of preemptive strikes. And probably pretty close to the top of Tom Ridge's No-Fly list.

Despite growing up in a Jewish settlement in the Middle East, Jesus set a premium on human rights. In Matthew 12:12, he told the Pharisees ,"People are worth much more than sheep!"

Of course, he never said people were smarter than sheep and in fact, compared them to sheep on a regular basis.

Christ was also a strong advocate for welfare, often asserting that those who refused to provide food and clothing for the poor were on a fast track to hell. Having depended on the kindness of strangers often, he regarded assistance to the needy the same as assistance to himself.

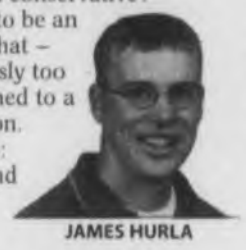
In the European fashion, Jesus and his followers also believed in access to medical care for all. They were perhaps best known in their times for providing medical care to the uninsured masses, free of charge.

When approached about who was going to pay for all this, Jesus probably reminded the skeptics that "It's easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven" Luke 18:25.

He also told them they'd better pay their taxes.

Perhaps this is all unfair to Jesus: he never had the chance to settle down and outgrow his radical ways. Instead, he died when he was 33, an age at which many of us will just be lucky to graduate from K-State.

We are left only to wonder how the "Rock of Ages" would have changed his ideas had he lived to pay property taxes.



As for me, I'm just wondering why Pat Robertson likes him so much.

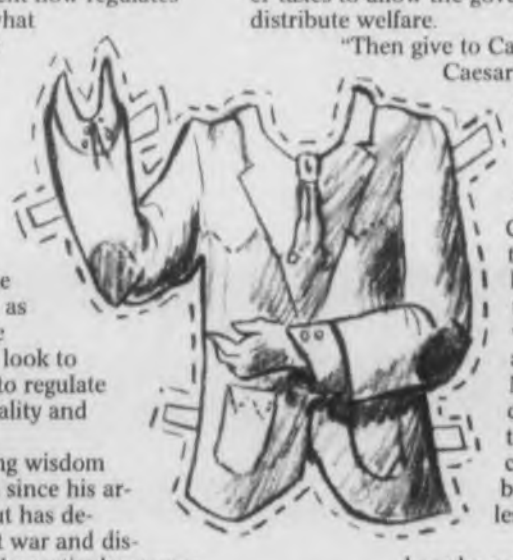
Jesus was right — conservatives are, too

JAMES HURLA



Was the most revolutionary man in our history a conservative?

You'd have to be an idiot to argue that – He was obviously too big to be confined to a political position.

So here I go:

Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ made a big push for personal responsibility, humbling oneself before others and staying accountable for your actions.

The government now regulates our actions, to what types of guns we can have in our homes to what we can see on television.

Instead of relying on each individual to look inside himself and make Godly decisions, as Jesus would have wanted, we now look to the government to regulate our actions, morality and our money.

Jesus' unending wisdom has been present since his arrival on earth, but has decayed into unjust war and dishonest leaders. No particular names come to mind.

LIFE

He was for it.

Children are our gifts from God, and welcoming them into this world and sharing with them the Good News was and is the Godly thing to do.

Matthew 19:14 says, "Jesus said, 'Let the little children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these'"

To think Jesus would have sided with the liberals in allowing a woman to kill her child because it was an inconvenience to her is nearly as blasphemous as this column is becoming.

CHRISTIANITY

Jesus favored one religion.

He was accepting of people of all faiths – Jews, Gentiles, pagans – but did lean slightly toward the whole "I am the way, the truth and the light" concept of there being only one God.

Even more appalling to liberals would be the fact that he used religion to make his points.

Using any sort of religious context in teaching today is looked down upon by liberals, and I'm not entirely convinced he could have been as effective if all religious language was stricken from his vocabulary.

WELFARE

Jesus' heart-felt compassion led him to speak on behalf of the poor and encourage others to give all they have to their less-fortunate neighbors.

But not once did he promote higher taxes to allow the government to distribute welfare.

"Then give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's," Jesus said in Luke 20:25. Conservatives don't like paying taxes, but we pay them all the same. Many also contribute to our local churches to benefit the less-fortunate.

I've never heard a conservative complain about giving money for God's work. Giving money for the government's work, though, often comes with a few grumbles.

SIN

He was against sin – sinners, though, he loved unconditionally.

Some people today have a difficult time separating the two. If someone speaks out against homosexuality, for instance, he is called homophobic.

Jesus never spoke against homosexuality, but there were other things he opposed – prostitution, money-grubbing – while still loving the people who committed the sins.

His vote likely would not support gay marriage or imposing fewer restrictions on sex and drugs. Just because he votes his conscious, though, would not make him an evil bigot who doesn't care about people, as conservatives often are labeled.

Jesus was not swayed by a sinful society.

To assign modern political labels to the man who was sent by God to die for the world's sins is a more-than-slightly insane task.

Instead, people from all sides of the political spectrum should realize the good things he taught us: love our neighbors as we would love ourselves, and let all our actions reflect the love we feel from God.

I wonder if Fourum calling is like drinking? The earlier you start in a day, the worse problem you have.

Woodpecker? How about the tit bush, or wood cock, or maybe the blue-footed booby?

Snowing again? I think I'm going to cry.

Someone should tell the Tri Delts that Christmas time is over, and those lights in their house just look tacky.

It would be appreciated if the K-State pep band would sit down during the women's games so that the people who sit behind them, who have season tickets and paid for their tickets, could see the game.

If liberal Democrats kept their mouths shut, as one caller suggested, then there would be no intelligent political comments whatsoever.

Jessica Grant, you wouldn't know music if it hit you in the face.

So my roommate's condom broke, and he said something about going to Mexico.

The Collegian sucks. We might have lost to Texas Tech Saturday, but we still deserve an article in the paper. Go Cats.

Keep my mouth shut? Is that part of the Patriot Act also?

Greek Affairs under direction of university

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Greek Affairs office will go under the direction of the university as of July 1, 2004.

Sara Jahansouz, president of the Panhellenic Council, said there will be a new staffing structure for Greek Affairs, including a director, two assistant directors and one administrative assistant.

Jahansouz said the director of greek life will report to the dean of the Office of Student Life, and the position will be partially funded by the university.

"The university will cover 55 percent, and the Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council dues will cover the remaining 45 percent," she said.

The agreement between K-State, the IFC and the Panhellenic Council states that K-State will allocate funds to IFC and Panhellenic Council for staff salaries with $52,000 for Fiscal Year 2005, $82,000 for 2006, $84,050 for 2007 and $86,150 for 2008.

These funds are based on the 55 percent and 45 percent philosophy that will be paid for by the university and Greek Affairs.

The agreement also states that all Greek Affairs' accounting, expenditures and receipts will be through the K-State Organizational Safekeeping procedures.

Jahansouz said the greek adviser serves as a link between Greek Affairs and the vice president of institutional advancement for K-State.

"Greek Affairs was basically just located on campus and graciously received office space from the university," she said. "Although, university administration has always been available for advice and assistance when needed."

Scott Jones, assistant dean of students and interim IFC adviser, said the changes are not different from what other universities have.

"We have looked at other universities, and they have been successful with this setup," he said.

Jahansouz said the Greek Affairs office and university are changing their relationship because of the findings at other universities.

"The type of relationship that we are building has been found to be a best practice across the nation," she said. "This is an ideal opportunity for both parties."

Mall sponsors swing-dancing lessons for couples

Tuesday nights at Manhattan Town Center will be filled with whirling and twirling couples until March 16.

The hour of free swing dance lessons for people of all ages is sponsored by the Picnic Place merchants.

This is the fourth year merchants decided to host this event in an attempt to unite the community in a relaxed and fun atmosphere. Audrea Martens, marketing director for the Picnic Place Merchants, said she's been happy with the previous participation.

"It's fun for all ages and is a great opportunity to brush up on your dancing skills, or just have a night of free fun," Martens said.

A total of 37 couples, some returning as well as some new faces, attended Feb. 10 for the first night of this event.

Mike Salerno, instructing now for 28 years, had his hands full, teaching the newcomers the rules for swing dancing but said he never gets sick of teaching those that want to learn.

"I teach the couples how to dance well and look good doing it," Salerno said. "I stress safety first, then posture and balance."

Salerno has been involved with the Picnic Place swing dance lessons all four years. He and his wife enjoy traveling from Topeka to show the younger generation some new moves.

"Most people tend to forget that swing dancing is not 'fast food.' People learn at different speeds and it's important to remember that it's a continuing process," Salerno said,

Ross Wilson, sophomore in computer engineering, and his partner, Stephanie Zimmerman sophomore in public relations, said they enjoyed their first swing-dance lesson and plan to continue attending.

They came with two other friends who added to the evening.

"We were just walking through the mall a few days ago, saw a sign for the lessons, and decided to give it a shot," said Suzanne Schreiber, sophomore in architectural engineering, accompanied by Cliff Olander.

Application deadline nearing for SGA elections

Student Governing Association Elections Chair Michael Pule said although many positions have not been completely filled, he expects many students will apply right before the deadline.

Pule said if fewer people apply for a position than there are spots for, the remaining spots can be filled via either write-in campaigns or appointment.

He said he encourages anyone interested in SGA to pick up an application in the Office of Student Activities and Services. The deadline is 4 p.m. Friday, Feb. 20.

Lower-ranked Iowa spoils Cats' winning streak

By Kelly Olson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's tennis team's winning streak was brought to an end by No. 68 Iowa on Sunday.

The Wildcats were defeated early in the meet as the top three players faced matches too tough to battle. The day resulted in a 6-1 loss.

The singles matches continued to be grim as five of the six members of the Wildcat team were defeated, leaving sophomore Aveen Alkhatib with the lone victory, which was won by default.

All three doubles matches also resulted in losses. The victory over the No. 41-ranked Cats allowed Iowa to improve to 5-0 on the season.

Junior Hayley McIver, who lost 6-1, 6-0, to Iowa's Anastasia Zhukova, said the surface of the courts contributed to the disappointing loss.

"Iowa is a tough team. It would be hard to beat them no matter where we played, but they had the fastest courts I have ever played on," she said.

"It was hard to adjust to the surface. I think we could have done a better job to adjust to the surface, but most of us were not able to in time."

"It was a new experience because it was the first time playing on courts that were too fast. We had to adjust and concentrate on the game," she said.

"The team was about at our level, but we couldn't develop all of our game because we were concentrating too much on the courts."

The Cats will be back in Manhattan on Sunday. The dual against Southwest Missouri State will begin at noon at the Cottonwood Racquet Club.

Men's golf team sits in 4th place after 1st spring competition

By Marshall Ice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's golf team is still in the hunt after its first 36 holes of the spring season.

The Wildcats are among 15 schools participating in the Matlock Collegiate Classic at the Grassland Golf and Country Club in Lakeland, Fla.

After the first day of competition, K-State sits in fourth place, 11 strokes behind leader Memphis.

"We had a good day," Coach Tim Norris said. "It definitely was the first day of the season. These guys have not played golf outside since Jan. 23. But I was quite pleased. I thought the guys did well. We will see what tomorrow brings, but this is a good start."

"Top to bottom the guys played consistently," Norris said.

Junior Matt Van Cleave led the Wildcats with a 145 and is among the top individually. Van Cleave shot an opening round 73 and improved by a stroke on his second try.

Seniors Tim Moody, A.J. Elgert and Greg Douglas all finished at 148. Douglas shot a pair of 74s. Elgert finished strong with a 71 to follow an initial round of 77. Moody also improved as the day went on, scoring a 76 and a 72.

Senior Aaron Watkins was a stroke behind that trio at 149. Watkins started with a 74 followed by a 75.

"The strongest winds were this morning and then it died down this afternoon," Norris said.

"The forecast is for the same kind of day today as well. If we can just be a little better we will be in good shape."

Norris said he was pleased to see his team stayed focused throughout the first day.

"The biggest thing with these 36-hole days is that you have to be out on the golf course for more than nine-and-a-half hours concentrating the whole time," Norris said. "That is a big difference from going to our practice facility at Brandeberry for a 40- or 45-minute session.

K-State has less experience at the Matlock than a few of the other schools in tournament.

"Some of the Southern schools have been here a few years in a row," Norris said.

"They are more adjusted to the golf course. We had never played at this event before or played this golf course. I think we did a good job of holding our own.

To pull out a win, the team will have to make adjustments to its short games.

"We are putting on Bermuda grass on the greens down here," Norris said. "That is something we are not used to. We play on bent greens at Colbert Hills."

"Our entire fall schedule was on bent grass greens. After about the third tournament this spring, we will be back on bent greens for the remainder of the season. This is kind of a transition period for us."

K-State tees off for the last 18 holes of the Matlock at 8:30 a.m. today.

"I am hoping they will get more accustomed to the golf course today and everyone can help themselves by a stroke or two," Norris said.

Whiffleball's appeal spans ages

By Matt Stuchlik
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whiffleball has been around as long as shattered windows have plagued our neighborhoods.

It now is possible for those who love whiffleball to bring that childhood feeling back.

"There are leagues and teams forming now for anyone who wants to give whiffleball a shot," said Matt McClure, Manhattan Parks and Recreation employee. "The fun begins March 7 in the comforts of the great indoors."

There are a lot of differences between baseball and whiffleball, McClure said.

"In Whiffleball, you don't get a whole lot of exercise. There is no base running like baseball," McClure said.

Players on a team hit in a certain order, but there is no base running. This is because of how the game is scored.

The scoring includes a one-point, two-point, three-point, and home–run zone. If a ball lands in a specific scoring zone without being caught, then the zone points are awarded.

"To get an out, a whiffleball player must either catch a fly ball or cleanly ground a low hit ball," McClure said.

When a team is up to bat, a member from that team pitches the ball. A player receives three pitches. If the player fails to make contact on any of the pitches, the player is out.

The game has seen little change through its years of existence. A player can use the yellow manufactured bats or a broom stick.

The whiffleball league is open to anyone in the community, including adults and K-State students.

There is a handful of students playing, but a majority of the teams are made up of adults.

"I love to play softball and at my work we always have a team, but when I heard about whiffleball I got really excited," he said.

"I played as a kid and figured that it would be a relaxing and fun sport to play."

Whiffleball is played indoors and there is not as much room as a baseball field.

"Every team has five players and have to pitch to themselves. I guess if you don't have a good pitcher your whole team is in trouble," Nordt said.

St. Joseph's unblemished record deserves respect

JOSH WITT

It seems that every year teams like Duke, Connecticut and Kansas are in the hunt for the men's NCAA basketball title.

Well, take note fans, because a little squad from Philadelphia is looking better than all of them.

While the aforementioned basketball powerhouses lost this past week, the other Hawks kept on rolling in maintaining an unblemished 22-0 record.

I know what you are thinking.

"Surely, you don't think a team from the Atlantic 10 Conference is really on par with the big boys of college basketball."

Sorry, but I do.

Let me make like Tony Kornheiser and "defend my boys."

True, the No. 2 Hawks have not played near the schedule of a Duke, UConn or any other major conference team, but the talent St. Joseph's possesses and what they have accomplished cannot be ignored.

In this day and age of college basketball, to be able to win week in and week out without a single letdown is impressive.

As the talent level in the game has been distributed more evenly than in years past, the odds of at least one or two upsets of even the most dominating squads have increased.

However, St. Joseph's is one of only two teams in the country – along with Stanford – to avoid being bitten by the upset bug. Coach Phil Martelli's squad has put away most of the teams it has played in convincing fashion.

Fourteen of St. Joseph's wins have come by double-digit margins.

"That's fine," you say, "But you've got to have more

NBA | Kings activate Webber

The Sacramento Kings activated Chris Webber from the injured list Monday, but the star forward will have to serve an NBA suspension before he can return to the lineup.

Webber

Webber, a five-time All-Star, was the Kings' leader in scoring, rebounding and assists last season. He hasn't played since tearing cartilage in his left knee during the second round of last season's playoffs, and he had extensive offseason surgery.

Webber faces a suspension after pleading guilty last July to charges of lying to a grand jury about his relationship with Ed Martin, a University of Michigan booster who claimed he loaned $616,000 to Webber.

The Sacramento Bee also reported that Webber would be suspended for violating the league's substance abuse policy.

The Kings compiled an NBA-best 37-13 record leading up to the All-Star break despite Webber's absence. Brad Miller, acquired from Indiana in an offseason trade, has fit seamlessly into Webber's spot in the Kings' offense, while fellow All-Star Peja Stojakovic is the NBA's third-leading scorer.

Track | Toth tests positive for THG, modafinil

American shot put champion Kevin Toth tested positive for the steroid THG and the stimulant modafinil at the 2003 national championships and could be suspended for two years, the U.S. Olympic Committee announced Monday.

Toth

Toth is one of four athletes who flunked THG tests during the U.S. championships in June. The others, announced earlier, were Regina Jacobs, John McEwen and Melissa Price.

Jacobs and Price also were national champions.

All four face two-year bans if the positive tests are upheld. Final decisions on their cases are expected this spring.

Later Monday, agent John Nubani announced Toth was retiring, though he still plans to go through with the appeals process.

Toth stunned the track and field world with a throw of 74 feet, 4 1/2 inches at the Kansas Relays in April — the best performance in the world in 13 years. His winning throw at the national championships was 69-7 1/2.

The USOC said Toth also tested positive for THG during an out-of-competition test in July.

MLB | Dodgers pluck DePodesta from A's

The hiring was the first move made by new owner Frank McCourt, who bought the team Friday from News Corp. for $430 million, and came just two days before pitchers and catchers are scheduled report to spring training in Vero Beach, Fla.

DePodesta, 31, has been a top assistant to Oakland general manager Billy Beane since joining the A's in 1998.

DePodesta, who becomes the ninth GM in Dodgers history, has an economics degree from Harvard. He becomes the second-youngest general manager in baseball, behind Red Sox GM Theo Epstein, who was 28 when he took the job in 2002.

DePodesta takes over a Dodgers team that had the best pitching staff and worst offense in baseball last season.

Maurice Clarett has hired an agent, ending any possibility that the running back would return to college next season.

Clarett's attorney, Alan Milstein, said Monday that the former Ohio State star was working with an agent in preparation for this week's NFL combine in Indianapolis, a move that would make him ineligible under NCAA rules.

On Feb. 5, U.S. District Judge Shira A. Scheindlin ruled that an NFL rule barring eligibility to Clarett and other underclassmen from April's draft violates antitrust law.

Is chivalry dead?

Changing gender roles might render old ways of dating useless

By Lacey Storer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to relationships, many girls love a guy who does romantic things for them. They want a guy who will open the door for them, leave them sweet notes and buy them flowers "just because."

"Girls want a guy who does nice things for them, because it makes them feel cared for and loved," Sarah Bloch, junior in secondary education, said. "I think all girls want that, because it shows that they are respected and cared for."

The practice of chivalry began in the Middle Ages, when it was set as a moral code for the knights.

Expected to be generous, loyal, courteous and gallant to the ladies, the knights set a standard for gentlemanly behavior that carried into modern times.

But as the role of men and women in relationships has become more equal, chivalry might become a thing of the past.

Tony Jurich, professor of marriage and family therapy, said as women have come to rely on men less over the years, the role of chivalry in relationships has been questioned.

"As we start to get into a more egalitarian society where physical brute strength from men is less needed, it comes into question if chivalry is needed," Jurich said. "Chivalry is not dead, it's just dormant."

Others agree chivalry hasn't died, but say it's now evolved to include women in the equation.

"I don't think it's necessarily dead," Jennifer Weisner, sophomore in business, said. "I think the difference is that now girls are starting to do things back to the guys. It hasn't ended, it's just kind of being altered."

Where men were once seen as the sole protector and provider in a relationship, women have taken a more equal role.

While they still appreciate thoughtful gestures, women are willing to return the favor. This kind of independence could have a negative effect of chivalry.

Men who want to be romantic and chivalrous may be intimidated by a woman's independence and afraid of offending them.

Paul Morizzo, senior in marketing, said women wanting to be equal can send a discouraging message about being chivalrous.

"Women are fighting to be equal, so we treat them like equals," Morizzo said. "We treat them like we treat guys – nice, but not overly nice."

"As we start to get into a more egalitarian society where physical brute strength from men is less needed, it comes into question if chivalry is needed."

Tony Jurich
PROFESSOR OF MARRIAGE AND FAMILY THERAPY

Gretchen Ekart, manager of Harry's Uptown, said the ratio of chivalrous to non-chivalrous men she sees in the restaurant is 50-50.

She agreed that female independence could play a role in whether or not a guy is chivalrous.

"I think it depends on the guy," Ekart said. "There are some out there who are so worried about offending the lady that they don't do it, and there are some out there who are just romantics at heart."

Worries about scaring off a girl with too much chivalry also might prevent guys from performing such gestures.

"Sometimes it seems like girls are overwhelmed with the stuff," Jeff Curry, junior in marketing, said. "If you do to much, they're like, 'Hey, I don't need all this.'"

Weisner said when it comes to chivalry, there is a fine line between enough and too much.

"I look for a guy that's courteous and chivalrous, but not to the point where I feel I can't reciprocate, or it makes me feel inferior to him."

"I think it died back in the day of the knights," Morizzo said. "I don't think it exists anymore."

Mike Simmons, freshman in open-option, said he agreed, and that chivalry is something rarely seen.

"For guys in general, it's dead," Simmons said. "You don't see guys doing common courtesy things like opening doors for girls – stuff like that."

Some think chivalry is still alive, but to a lesser extent than previous times.

"I think guys still do nice things," Bloch said, "but I think it's on a lower scale than it was before."

Bloch said the decrease in chivalrous men could be attributed to how they were raised and taught to treat women.

Simmons agreed, saying that it's not that guys don't want to be chivalrous, they just don't know how.

"They were never taught correctly," Simmons said. "It just died throughout the generations."

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, said she think men still have chivalrous intentions and sees this in the men who come into her store.

"I think more guys want to be chivalrous. I think guys still want to be the hero or the protector," Medlin said.

"I see a lot more than I used to of just for-no-reason-at-all," Medlin said.

It's these gestures that can reassure a person of her lover's affection and can make a relationship stronger.

"All too often, what I find in relationships is that we don't have the courtesy of treating the other person with care," Jurich said. "We love each other in the grand things and we forget the little things, and sometime those little things are very important."

Parking issue concerns students, faculty

By Bailey Basinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a perfect world, at a perfect university, parking passes are available to anyone.

They are given free at enrollment, and spaces are abundant. Students and faculty are allowed to park directly in front of the building they are going to and walks never exceed three minutes.

However, nothing is ever perfect, and K-State is no exception to this rule.

Parking problems are constantly a concern, not only for students, but for faculty and staff as well.

Jessie Unruh, sophomore in print journalism, deals with the parking issue on a daily basis.

She said looking for a parking spot has either made her late to class or, sometimes, caused her to just give up and skip class all together.

"If I want a parking spot, I have to leave my apartment 30 minutes before my class starts," Unruh said. "Even leaving that early, there is still no guarantee of getting a place to park."

She also said a big factor is the time of day.

"Early morning or afternoon arrives stand a better chance at getting a parking spot," Unruh said. "Mid-morning and noontime arrivers have less of a shot."

He also said he knows there is a big problem with faculty parking.

"Faculty members might have a class and then need to leave and go to a meeting off campus. After their meeting they might be teaching another class," Abbott said. "The staff tends to go back and forth more than students do."

Abbott said everyone wants the number of spaces adjusted in their favor. Students and teachers both believe they have the worse end of the deal. When judging by the numbers it's fairly equal.

Jeff Barnes, safety and security chief for Parking Services, said 8,000 off-campus student permits were sold this year. There are about 3,400 spaces for those 8,000 passes.

The faculty doesn't have it much better, however. For the 3,500 passes sold there are about 1,600 spaces for them to park in.

"It's hard to judge how many spaces are available because many of our lots can overlap," Barnes said. "A teacher is allowed to park in a student lot and students are allowed to park in some areas of residence hall parking."

Talk of the possibility of a parking garage is still lingering, but nothing has been decided, Barnes said.

"It is not a decision for Parking Services – it's up to Parking Council and Student Governing Association," he said. "I think any growth is a good thing, but there is always the issue of safety and cost. Making everyone happy is difficult."

PERMITS | Permit forgery has monetary consequences

campus, Barnes said.

In addition, the student receives a $25 wheel lock and may be banned from parking on campus for six months.

Stolen permits have also been a problem on campus.

Students leave their car windows down or their doors unlocked and people take unprotected permits, Barnes said.

Lt. Richard Herrman, patrol commander for the K-State Police Department, said any permit that is stolen is reported through campus police. If campus police is out patrolling the parking lots, it will report forged or inappropriate permits to Parking Services.

Herrman said the number of stolen permits varies from semester to semester.

"It's more active at the start of the semester, and then it tapers off," he said.

Despite confusion, Webmail still available to graduates

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although some K-State graduates were reporting their Webmail accounts being taken away, this is not the case, Information Technology Assistance Center Help Desk Coordinator Larry Robertson, said.

Robertson said although the storage in inbox folders is terminated after a student's final semester, the Webmail account is still active, but is used as a forwarding device.

This forwarding service is available as long as the eID remains active – which means that it has been used once every five years.

"If they have their e-mail forwarded from their email address to another one outside of campus, it will forward as long as they hold their eID," Robertson said.

"Inbox for mail coming in will go away the next semester after they graduate."

Joel Mease, former K-State student, said he received an e-mail about the loss of service about two weeks before he ceased to be a student.

"They told me in an e-mail that I couldn't use it after a certain day," he said.

Mease said he did not understand the e-mail to say that just the storage would be terminated, but interpreted it as the service as a whole would be taken away.

"They said I had to be enrolled, a faculty member or a student," he said.

Robertson said the reason for terminating graduates' storage was that the Web space used to store materials in users' inboxes is a finite resource and must be reserved for active students, faculty and employees of the university.

"You have certain rights as long as you are actively a student," Robertson said.

"Once you leave, then you lose certain abilities, and one of those is disk space for your e-mail."

Robertson said graduates still are supposed to change their passwords every semester as well.

The talks represent the first real test of flexibility on long-entrenched positions, such as the disputed Kashmir region – the cause of two of the countries' three wars since their 1947 independence from Britain.

More than 65,000 people have been killed in an insurgency that has raged in Indian-controlled portions of the territory since 1989.

The agenda for resolving decades of enmity was first agreed to in 1997 but failed to make any headway.

"Since a lot of work has already been done in the past years, it will not be difficult for us to reach a conclusion," Sinha said.

In January, Vajpayee agreed to discuss Kashmir while Musharraf promised not to support terrorism in Pakistani territory directed against India.

Early this month, Indian Defense Minister George Fernandes said Pakistan's government has taken effective measures against Islamic militant groups based in Pakistan, leading to a decline in incursions into Indian-controlled Kashmir.

In the latest violence, suspected rebels shot and killed a local politician Monday as he stood on a roadside in Srinagar, the summer capital of India's Jammu-Kashmir state, police said.

Two police officers nearby raced to the scene and opened fire on the assailants.

One officer was killed and the other wounded as the attackers retaliated before escaping.

Meanwhile, in Muzaffarabad, capital of Pakistan-controlled Kashmir, more than 500 people Monday from a political group seeking Kashmir's independence blocked a main street for nearly two hours to protest the Pakistan-India talks.

"These negotiations are being held to end the Kashmiris' struggle," said Ghulam Nabi War, a Jammu-Kashmir Liberation Front leader.

"The two countries are not interested in people of Kashmir. They don't respect their wishes."

After coming close to fighting a fourth war in 2002, India and Pakistan have moved to restore transportation links and diplomatic ties. Soldiers in November halted cross-border firing in Kashmir.

India is also set to embark on its first cricket tour of Pakistan since 1989 – a breakthrough for the two cricket-crazy nations.

However, Vajpayee is expected to stay in power and pursue the peace process.

COLUMN | St. Joseph's playmakers provide credible competition for all

Big deal, they can beat up on other small schools. Anyway, weren't you the same guy who dogged on mid-major TCU football when they were undefeated?"

St. Joseph's has two of the best in college basketball, end of story.

Read this stat line: 20.2 points, 4.5 rebounds, 5.3 assists and 3.4 steals per game.

That's good.

Then there is junior guard Delonte West, who is far more than just a supporting character in the Hawks' cast.

West basically has matched Nelson stat-for-stat this year, putting up 19 points, 5.5 rebounds, 4.9 assists and 1.8 steals a game.

Oh yeah, and he shot a perfect 12-of-12 from the floor in a Jan. 17 game against Xavier.

Try to find a back court without the names Duhon and Redick who even come close to that kind of production.

You won't.

Against any competition, those numbers are phenomenal.

"OK, so they have some good guards, but what about their inside play? Won't they need some good posts to compete in the tournament?"

Not necessarily.

Though it is always nice to have a well-rounded squad, recent history has shown that come tournament time, guard play is what matters most.

There was floor-general Mateen Cleaves leading the Michigan State Spartans in 2000 to a national championship, then Jay Williams and Duke and Juan Dixon and Maryland following suit in the following two seasons.

Even last year when forward Carmelo Anthony was the star of the champion Syracuse Orangemen, without point guard Gerry McNamara's 3-point shooting in the title game, the Orangemen do not win the game.

St. Joseph's appears to have the same perimeter talent that has been the recipe for greatness.

However, now is when the mental fortitude of the Hawks will be tested.

They are starting to gain recognition.

Teams are more likely to pull out all the stops to beat the Hawks, so they can say they were the ones to ruin St. Joseph's undefeated season.

If last week was any indication, Nelson, West and company are up to the challenge.

Nelson was honored with Sports Illustrated's cover, and the sports world sat back and waited for the Hawks and their leader to fall to the pressure and the vaunted "cover curse."

It didn't happen.

The Hawks knocked off a very solid Dayton team 81-67 at home and then took care of Rhode Island 73-59 in the week's action.

Nelson was even named Atlantic 10 player of the week.

I knew you'd come around.

After the men's basketball team lost Saturday to No. 22 Texas Tech in Lubbock, Texas, the Wildcats have lost 21 straight conference road games, dating back to Jan. 6, 2002.

On Wednesday, K-State (11-10, 3-7) will be on the road to try to snap the streak against the Nebraska Cornhuskers (14-7, 4-6).

Although the Wildcats have lost every road game this season, in the past two games away from Bramlage Coliseum, K-State has begun to show improvement.

Narrowly losing to Colorado by a point and overcoming double-digit deficits twice against the Red Raiders to pull within three points both times, before finally falling.

"It's frustrating because you're right there and just can't get over that hump, but you don't want to hang your head," senior guard Tim Ellis said.

Coach Jim Wooldridge said the streak is in the back of his players' minds, but they are dealing with it appropriately.

"Our players are talking about the streak in the right way," Wooldridge said. "They are working hard and trying to solve the puzzle."

In the past two road games, the Wildcats' big three, senior guards Jarrett Hart, Ellis and junior forward Jeremiah Massey, have carried the team.

Ellis has been on a tear during the past two road games, averaging 22.5 points. Although Massey and Hart each have had a game not scoring in double figures, they still have averaged 15 and 11.5 points respectively in the two road games.

Wooldridge said his players' performance hinges on how they handle themselves.

"We have to control who we are and how we play," Wooldridge said.

The Cornhuskers are coming off an upset win against then-No. 12 Kansas on Sunday at the Bob Devaney Center and are on a three-game winning streak since they lost to K-State, 78-61, Feb. 4.

In the 17-point win at Bramlage, K-State's zone defense held Nebraska to just 32 percent shooting from the floor.

Massey scored a game-high 24 points, while Hart and Ellis each had 16 points.

The Wildcats also shot a season-best 63 percent from the field.

"Hart, Massey and Ellis were really effective against us," Nebraska coach Barry Collier said. "We know we have to play at a high level and we have to do everything we can to beat K-State."

Collier said the loss to the Wildcats was somewhat of a wake-up call.

"It was a turning point to a certain extent. It gave us further realization how well we have to play," Collier said.

During their three-game winning streak, the Cornhuskers have shot 50.7 percent from the field and are averaging 78.3 points a game, while holding its opponents to 40.3 percent shooting and winning by an average of almost 14 points.

"They've got an experienced team, a much-improved basketball team," Wooldridge said.

Even though the Wildcats are hovering around the bottom of the Big 12, Wooldridge said he is excited for the rest of the season.

"This is an exciting time of year," Wooldridge said. "We have six games left and still have a lot of opportunities."

A&M better than 1-10 record; Cats enter game cautiously

By Louie Novak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's basketball team begins a two-game road trip Wednesday when the Wildcats travels to College Station, Texas, to square off against the Texas A&M Aggies.

K-State (19-3, 10-1) has won six straight and is coming off an 89-69 win against Nebraska.

Junior forward Kendra Wecker scored 18 points to lead five Wildcats in double figures as K-State avenged its only conference loss.

Freshman guards Twiggy McIntyre and Claire Coggins scored 13 and 12 respectively, and junior guard Laurie Koehn and senior center Nicole Ohlde each had 11 as the Wildcats connected on 32-of-60 from the field for 53 percent.

The Wildcats nailed a season-best 11-of-17 (64.7) 3-pointers against the Huskers and dished out 26 assists, the second-most of the year.

The Cats will try to avoid an upset to an Aggie team that has given some of the Conference's best a run for their money lately.

"We went down there two years ago and had a close game," Mahoney said. "We are all definitely going to have to be prepared to go."

Texas A&M (8-15, 1-11) came up short in a 59-58 loss to Texas Tech on Saturday.

The Aggies let a 3-point lead slip away in the final 19 seconds, and Tech's LaToya Davis' layup with six seconds was the deciding bucket in the contest.

A&M also had an impressive performance against Texas last Wednesday.

The Aggies overcame a pair of 12-point deficits and had the Longhorns lead cut to four points with seven minutes remaining before falling 66-55.

Overall, Texas A&M's losses have been by an average of 8.5 points and just 5.5 points on their home court at Reed Arena.

Of the Aggies' 15 losses this season, 12 have been by 10 points or less.

Texas A&M is a team that prides itself on defense.

In Big 12 games, A&M leads the league in turnover margin and steals.

The Aggies are seventh in scoring defense and have held their last 10 league opponents at or below their average scoring output.

Ohlde said the key for K-State to be successful is to stick to what works.

"We just come out every day at practice really focused," Ohlde said. "When you go down there, you have to stay true to who you are."

Texas A&M is led by senior Toccara Williams.

Williams is the Aggies leader in scoring, at 15.5, assists, at 7, and steals, at 4. She ranks seventh in the Big 12 in scoring overall and third in league games. She is the only Big 12 player to record more than 1,000 points, 600 assists, and 400 steals.

A&M sophomore Tamea Scales is also becoming a threat.

After scoring just one point at Nebraska on Jan. 17, Scales has assumed a starting role the last seven games and doubled her per game average with 13.1 points and 10 rebounds.

Senior Lynn Classen ranks No. 3 in the Big 12 in blocked shots with 42. Classen has blocked 125 shots in her career.

K-State's Kendra Wecker keeps the ball from Nebraska's Alexa Johnson during the Wildcats' win at Bramlage Coliseum. K-State travels to College Station Wednesday to face a struggling Texas A&M team.

K-State assistant coach Kamie Ethridge said you can't judge the Aggies by their record.

"I think ultimately the first thing you have to do is go on the road with the ultimate respect for your opponent," Ethridge said. "Everybody that has played them said they play hard. They don't play like a 1-10 team. We are all aware of their athleticism and the problems they could present for our team."

Consistency in game, aggressiveness to help women repeat win over Tigers

By Louie Novak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last time K-State faced Missouri, the Wildcats pounded the Tigers 95-59 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The two teams face off again Saturday when the Cats travel to Columbia for a rematch of the Jan. 7 contest.

Senior center Nicole Ohlde shot 14-of-16 from the field for a total of 31 points, and junior guard Laurie Koehn bombed seven 3-pointers for a season-high 25 in a game that was never close.

The Wildcats want to finish the regular season on a good note as the teams gear up for March.

As for Missouri, the Tigers have lost three of their last five, and things are not going to get easier for them this week.

Missouri hosts No. 7 Texas Tech tonight before the ninth-ranked Wildcats come to town.

The Tigers stand at 13-9 and are 4-7 in conference play after their 71-46 win against Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla.

Unrau led all players with 18 points and 13 rebounds for her Big 12-leading 10th double-double of the season, and fifth in conference play.

"It's a matter of executing and staying true to our game and being aggressive. When we get out and run transition we tend to get the points that we've been getting."

Megan Mahoney
JUNIOR FORWARD

Senior guard MyEsha Perkins chipped in with 14 points, senior forward Stretch James added 11 points and eight rebounds, and senior guard Tracy Lozier contributed 10 points and six assists.

K-State has won 17 of its last 18 games, including six straight.

During the current streak the Wildcats have won five of the six by double figures.

The Cats have outscored their last three opponents (Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska) by an average of 25.3 points.

"It's a matter of executing and staying true to our game and being aggressive," junior forward Megan Mahoney said.

"When we get out and run transition we tend to get the points that we've been getting."

Assistant coach Kamie Ethridge said the recent success can be attributed to the team playing harder as well as bench play.

"It's a sense of urgency that our team finally got. Just playing hard separates you from a lot of teams," Ethridge said.

"We have had the consistency from our top three or four players, but now we are getting consistency from our bench, too."

Men try to recover from recent heart-breaking losses to Buffs

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last time these teams met, the game was decided in the last 3.6 seconds of the game.

On Saturday, the K-State (11-10, 3-7) men's team will welcome the Colorado Buffaloes (13-8, 5-5) and try to avenge its heart-breaking loss in Boulder, Feb. 7.

Although the Wildcats have struggled on the road this season, they are 12-3 at Bramlage Coliseum, winning two of their last three at home.

Colorado's most recent road loss came Feb. 10 against Missouri where the team was unable overcome poor second-half free-throw shooting (41 percent) and a late 18-2 Tiger run to split the season series.

In the first meeting, K-State held Colorado to 45 percent shooting, outrebounded the Buffaloes 40-35 and shot 23 percent better from the free-throw line, despite the loss.

Senior guard Tim Ellis scored 25 points and junior forward Jeremiah Massey added 21 points and 12 rebounds.

Colorado coach Ricardo Patton said after the win, his team didn't deserve the win.

"They outshot us at the free-throw line they outrebounded us. They just out-played us," Patton said. "I don't believe the best team won the game, and that's what I told our players."

The Wildcats again will have to find a way to stop junior, David Harrison and senior guard Michel Morandais.

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Tim Ellis drives by Iowa State's Curtis Stinson during the Wildcats win at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We don't have a stopper," said Coach Jim Wooldridge. "We have to do a better job as a team on defense."

Harrison is third in the Big 12 in scoring, averaging 16.4 points a game and is fifth in rebounds, with 8.5 rebounds per game.

He also leads the league in field-goal percentage at 62 percent.

Morandais, who had a game-high 18 points in the Missouri loss, is averaging 16.0 points a game, good for sixth in the Big 12.

Even though the Buffaloes squeaked past the Wildcats in the first game, Patton said K-State has the right formula going for them.

"They play hard and they have the right pieces," Patton said. "It's only a matter of time before they break through."

Big 12 men

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The clock is ticking for conference teams wanting a crack at the Big 12 men's regular season title.

With only three weeks remaining in the regular season, many teams still have a shot at winning the the regular-season trophy.

While Oklahoma State appears to be in the driver's seat, Texas and Kansas are just behind the Cowboys with Texas Tech and Oklahoma also in the championship hunt.

WHO'S HOT?

Oklahoma State

The Cowboys are continuing to play the best basketball in the conference.

Coach Eddie Sutton's team has reeled off nine straight victories, including a dominating 80-60 win Feb. 9 at home versus the Kansas Jayhawks.

Going into Monday night's game at Oklahoma, the No. 7 Cowboys (19-2, 9-1) held a one-game advantage for the conference lead ahead of Texas.

Junior point guard John Lucas has led the way for the Cowboys in recent weeks, as the Baylor transfer scored more than 20 points in each of his last three games prior to Monday night.

On Saturday, Oklahoma State will host Nebraska in Stillwater, where they are undefeated this season.

Nebraska

On Sunday, Nebraska (14-7, 4-6) pulled off the biggest win of the season, defeating Kansas 74-55 at home.

The win was Nebraska's third in a row and now the prospect of an NCAA tournament berth seems to be within reach.

This week the Cornhuskers attempt to continue their winning ways, playing K-State at home Wednesday and traveling to Oklahoma State on Saturday.

Texas

Despite falling by one point at Iowa State Saturday, Texas has been successful in recent weeks.

The No. 11 Longhorns (17-4, 8-2) had won five straight games before falling to the Cyclones in Ames.

Prior to Saturday the Texas defense had been on a roll, holding opponents to 52.7 points per game over their last three contests.

This week Texas plays Texas A&M (7-14, 0-10) at home Wednesday and then travels to Norman, Okla., to battle Oklahoma on Saturday.

WHO'S NOT?

Iowa State

The Cyclones might have resurrected their hopes of a berth in the NCAA tournament with Saturday's win against the Longhorns.

However, the Cyclones still have much work to do in improving their résumé for the NCAA Selection Committee.

Iowa State (14-7, 5-5) had lost three in a row, including a 90-59 rout at the hands of K-State (11-10, 5-5) although Saturday's win snapped their losing streak, the Cyclones have still yet to prove they can win on the road in conference.

Coach Wayne Morgan's squad is winless in all four Big 12 road games which could be a bad sign, as Iowa State travels to Missouri (11-10, 5-5) and Kansas this week.

Kansas

What happened to the Kansas Jayhawks?

After defeating No. 22 Texas Tech 96-77 just 10 days ago, the Jayhawks proceeded to collapse in their next two road games.

On Feb. 9, No. 21 Kansas (15-6, 7-3) was blown out by 20 at Oklahoma State, and then followed that loss up with an embarrassing lopsided defeat at unranked Nebraska.

Texas A&M

Texas A&M (7-14, 0-10) has lost nine of its 10 conference games by less than 10 points and five games by less than six.

Saturday's six-point loss at home to Oklahoma was the latest close defeat for the Aggies.

Texas A&M's schedule is giving them no relief, as this week the Aggies play Texas and Texas Tech (18-6, 6-4) on the road.

Big 12 women

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This past weekend Big 12 women's action showed that no matter the record, any team can compete on any given night.

Texas Tech nearly fell to the last-place Texas A&M, while Iowa State knocked off a ranked Baylor team at home.

As the regular season winds down, Texas and K-State have emerged at the top of the pack with just one conference loss each while Colorado still has its championship hopes alive with an 8-3 record in Big 12 play.

WHO'S HOT?

K-State

K-State has simply rolled over its competition in recent weeks.

The No. 9 Wildcats (19-3, 10-1) have won their last four games by an average of 22.5 points.

Nebraska (16-7, 6-6) was K-State's sixth-straight victim, losing by 20 Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

On Wednesday the Wildcats travel to play the Texas A&M Aggies (8-15, 1-11), and then hit the road again on Sunday to play Missouri (13-9, 4-7).

Oklahoma

The No. 24 Sooners (16-6, 6-5) have won their last three games since losing four straight in January.

Highlighting Oklahoma's winning streak was an impressive 68-62 win on Feb. 10 at No. 9 Texas Tech.

On Wednesday, Oklahoma will play No. 13 Colorado before battling the No. 19 Baylor Bears (18-6, 6-5) on the road Saturday.

Texas

Texas (23-2, 11-1) has won nine games a row, not losing since a Jan. 14 game at Baylor.

The Longhorns will be tested again on the road Sunday as they match up with Texas Tech (21-4, 7-4).

WHO'S NOT?

Kansas

The month of February has not been kind to the Jayhawks.

Kansas (9-13, 2-9) has lost all four games it has played in the month and has lost eight of its last nine games overall.

The Jayhawk offense has been the principle reason for the losing streak, as Kansas has failed to score more than 60 points in its last four games.

This week the Jayhawks will spend the week in Lawrence, hosting Iowa State (11-11, 4-7) on Tuesday and Texas A&M on Saturday.

Oklahoma State

The season has gone from bad to worse for the ladies from Stillwater, Okla.

After starting the conference season with just one win in their first five games, the Cowgirls are once again struggling.

Oklahoma State (8-15, 3-9) has failed to win its last five games losing by double-digit margins in each defeat.

Trips to Baylor on Wednesday and Colorado on Saturday make up the week's schedule for Oklahoma State.

Freshman guards step up, perform well as future of women's program

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They live together off the court, but on the court, freshman guards Claire Coggins and Twiggy McIntyre play together. Lately, they are playing together a lot more.

And K-State basketball fans are noticing.

The Feb. 14 game against Nebraska had 10,300 fans armed with the usual array of signs for their usual Big Four, Nos. 3, 10, 34 and 53.

But a few new ones were added with fans paying homage to No. 14 ("Claire Coggins will you be my valentine?") and No. 15 ("Winning ain't no biggie cause we've got Twiggy").

K-State's Twiggy McIntyre

Lindsey Bauman
COLLEGIAN

"They are beginning to bring us quality balance on both ends of the floor helping us not just stay where we're at, but maybe changing the game," Coach Deb Patterson said.

A simple statement, but effective actions for a team that was running on endurance alone at this time last year rounding out the regular season and preparing for tournament play with four or five players regularly logging between 35 and 40 minutes per game.

Although her two backup guards are still freshmen, Patterson said they help provide fresh legs in the game and now add another dimension as they begin to understand K-State's system.

"They're going to bring us some resiliency," she said. "Their presence will be a major factor as we head down the road here of allowing our basketball team to stay fresh and that's very different for us. I'm really encouraged by the fact that they are continuing to progress."

Coggins said watching the upperclassmen play helps her understand the importance of each game and improvement in each of those games.

"I've learned that every day, every possession counts," she said. "They play with so much heart and so much focus that it's really hard to come into a game and not care or be focused, because the aura around them I just want to get it done."

McIntyre burst out her basketball shell Feb. 4 in Ames, Iowa, where in a close contest, she provided a spark of the bench scoring a career-high 13 points.

"Every night you have to be ready," she said. "Coach calls on you, I may be the first or last person she calls on, but you have to be ready to get out there. You have to be ready to play every day.

"That game I just knew it was time to step up. My team needed me and I was just glad I could step up and have a positive impact on the game."

Patterson said McIntyre's game adds another element that could cause problems for defenders.

"I'm really excited about the scoring dimension that Twiggy brings to the floor. She's a player you have to guard or she'll hurt you. She's bringing a multi dimension offensively as scorer and a passer.

With Coggins, although capable of producing on both sides of the floor, a long wingspan and a tenacity for physical play help bring what Patterson calls "chaos to our defense."

"With Claire, what we get on the defensive end is a big strong physical body with quick hands," Patterson said. "She tends to be a bit more physical than other players we have on the defensive end at times and it's not always intended but serves a purpose from time to time. Her offense is becoming more timely as she begins to understand system."

McIntyre said she has come a long way, but a long road remains ahead.

"I've learned how to be a more patient, more enthusiastic point guard," she said. "I've felt like I've matured, but I have a long way to go."

Mahoney gains respect

Junior forward rises from underrated player to one of nation's best weapons

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"She's just an amazing player that does so much for our team. It's just so hard to cover all that she does."

Laurie Koehn
JUNIOR GUARD

She's the fourth player talked about, but the energy behind everybody else's play.

"Ask anybody in our league, they'll say Megan Mahoney is like our secret weapon," Kamie Ethridge, associate head coach, said. "She's underrated, but she's one that you'd die to have on your team because she just makes everybody else play harder and play better."

Saturday's rematch against Nebraska was "Megan Mahoney Day" and marked her 90th consecutive start since coming to K-State in 2001.

The 6-foot forward leads the team in assists, with 110, which also marks her third season to have at least 100 assists.

"She's the one everybody follows," Ethridge said. "She's really smart in the game and really understands the game and gets people in the right spot, but she's the one who gets out of herself and really understands what's going on out on the court for everybody else."

"She likes to get the crowd up. She's the one out there pumping her arms and trying to get the crowd loud," Koehn said.

"She just brings all the intangibles to things like hustle plays, she'll be in there getting the rebound and leading us in assists, scoring when they step off of her.

"She's just an amazing player that does so much for our team it's just so hard to cover all that she does."

Besides leading the team in assists, Mahoney marked another milestone in her career when she became only the second K-State player to record a triple-double against St. Louis on Dec. 6, 2002.

Mahoney said she balances the team in whatever way she can.

"I'm not going to be out there scoring 20 points a game, so I've got to try and contribute in other ways," Mahoney said.

The thing that makes Mahoney work with the K-State team, Ethridge said, is that she fits anywhere on the court.

"The thing we liked about Megan was that she was on varsity at an eighth grader," Ethridge said.

"She played up. I mean it's South Dakota, and it's not the high level of basketball ever in the whole world, but it's a very competitive league, and as an eighth grader she was playing with seniors.

"She's had so much experience playing with older people.

"What she did in the summers was play against guys, so she really has a versatile game that can make her go so many places. You can't really name her as a number."

Outside of basketball, Mahoney's roommates said she is a neat freak.

"Her room will be messy, but every other part of the house will have to be clean," forward Kendra Wecker said. "It's crazy."

Wecker and Mahoney came to K-State in the same class, and since then many games include highlights involving a Mahoney to Wecker pass Wecker said it's just a connection they developed when they met.

"We didn't know each other at all. I had heard some crazy stories about her, like how she was kind of free-spirited and she did whatever she wanted," Wecker said.

"We came to camp, and the first day she comes in wearing these red soccer shorts and this bright tie-dyed shirt, and I didn't know about her.

"We played at camp for like three days, and then the coaches put us on the same team and it was like we had been playing together for like 10 years. It was just an instant connection.

"We knew where each other were. We didn't even really have to get adjusted to one another."

Ethridge said it's just icing on the cake that Mahoney is so multitalented.

"Name something she doesn't do," Ethridge said. "She really dominates the play in so many ways.

"She's one of the leading rebounders, she is the top assist person, and all the leadership intangibles she brings, we just wouldn't be the same team without her."

Koehn closes in on career records; teammates, national media notice

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Laurie Koehn fires a shot against Missouri at Bramlage Coliseum. Koehn has managed to assert herself once again as a threat from behind the 3-point line for the Wildcats.

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Deb Patterson said anything goes once Koehn gets the ball beyond half court, except for posting up.

But senior center Nicole Ohlde jokingly said she's working with Koehn on that one.

"She's incredibly focused," Ohlde said. "Anytime she steps on the floor she has this tunnel vision and knows what's ahead of her. She can bust from anywhere on the court and we have extreme confidence that anytime she has the ball in her hand, she's going to knock down a three."

"The person defending her could be right in her eye, and she still knocks it down. She really stretches the defense."

The next 3-point shot she makes will move her to second place on the all-time list, 20 shy of the record.

Rethman, current holder of that No. 2 spot, said she and Kim Woodlee, the career leader, knew their records were in jeopardy playing with and now watching Koehn.

"We knew we had LK coming up behind us," Rethman said. "She's one of the hardest workers I've ever been around. She loves the game and loves to play and loves to win."

Unaware of her standing, Koehn said she was more concerned with those shots producing wins than breaking records.

"I don't know about the charts and moving up and down," she said. "We just come out here and take care of our business as a team. Woodlee and Rethman are two people that I really have a ton of respect for with their work ethic and shooting ability, and it's great to be in the same league as them even.

"They were just two really hard workers and people that I really looked up to here as a freshman in the program and still look up to and realize that they accomplished a lot. They were amazing shooters and I'm glad I had the opportunity to be on the floor with them." I t is for her talent beyond the arc and her presence on the floor that made Koehn a finalist for this year's Nancy Lieberman Award,

By Nabil Shaheen and Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

We could have waited three weeks.

We could have made it easy on ourselves, but no, we are putting our lives and reputations on the line.

Here, exactly 21 days prior to the women's Big 12 tournament and 23 days before the men's Big 12 tournament, are our projections for what is left of the conference season and how things will shake down in Dallas.

No harm or jinx were intended in the making of these brackets.

LOUIE NOVAK

At every K-State women's basketball game, Wildcat announcer Matt Walters follows the home team's starting lineup introductions with the words, "and representing the sixth man, the Wildcat fans."

For opposing teams, Bramlage Coliseum has been a house of horrors the past two seasons, and the sixth man for K-State has a lot to do with that.

Prior to this semester I had never been to a K-State women's basketball game and hadn't witnessed the enthusiasm the fans had for their nationally ranked women's basketball program.

After covering the team for two months, I have been impressed.

The women dominate at home, and Bramlage Coliseum is developing a reputation as one of the toughest places to play in the country.

The home-court advantage K-State has over teams who make the trip to Manhattan is apparent in the current home winning streak the team has.

K-State is 10-0 at home this season and have won 29 consecutive regular season games.

Last year, the Cats went 19-0 at home during the regular season with their only home loss coming to Notre Dame in the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

In the last two seasons, K-State has lost only three games at home and has won 14 straight Big 12 Conference games at Bramlage.

Not too bad, huh?

Fans who pack Bramlage are loud and proud, and for the past two seasons the women have finished in the top 8 in Division 1 national attendance figures.

This season K-State is ranked sixth in the nation with an average attendance of 9,030 fans per game. The sellout game against KU this year was the 23rd-largest crowd in Division 1 women's basketball this year.

Saturday's crowd of 10,300 was the fourth largest to witness a Wildcat game this season and the third biggest at home.

The team didn't disappoint those who attended and rocked Nebraska 81-63.

"It is very important to us. The fans definitely get us going," Ohlde said. "The fact that this place is packed with screaming energetic fans brings a lot of electricity to the court and plays a huge role in the game."

Junior forward Kendra Wecker agreed with her teammates' comments and added, "We all love playing at home and doing well for our fans."

Five games remain for K-State this season, and two of those are at home. The Cats will face a dismal Iowa State team Feb. 25 and then battle Big 12 power Texas Tech March 3 in what will be a tremendous challenge for their current streaks, as well as a sign of where they stand as they prepare for both the Big 12 and NCAA tournaments.

Until then, one thing is certain as the K-State women close out the 2003-04 season: the fans definitely love their Cats.

Guard getting noticed by media

which honors the country's top point guard in Division I basketball.

"Nancy Lieberman-Kline was an amazing basketball player and someone that any young basketball player would look up to and aspire to be like her," Koehn said.

"To be honored by even being up for the award is definitely an honor, and I'm really appreciative for it.

"But there are just some really good players who are up for it that I have a ton of respect for, too, and am honored to be in their company."

Patterson said Koehn continues to work on adding other dimensions to her game on both sides of the ball.

"She is such a workhorse, and she is someone who quietly and with a workman's attitude goes about her business in competing," she said.

"It's just exciting to see her game evolving. She might not be real proficient posting you up, but aside from that, people go into a game with a major preoccupation to guard her as soon as she crosses half court.

"She's going to be a threat if you are not on her. She's a tremendous weapon."

"Laurie is one of the most focused, dedicated and hard-working people and players that I know," she said. "That's why she's an amazing shooter – because of all the work she has put into it."

Chem researcher injured in lab explosion Tuesday

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A person was injured Tuesday in an explosion a K-State chemistry lab.

At 11:19 a.m. Tuesday, Riley County Fire Department responded to a call regarding a minor explosion in room 148 of the Chemistry/Biochemistry building.

Vincent Ortiz, professor of chemistry and acting department head, said the victim was a post- doctoral fellow.

Ortiz declined to identify the individual, but said that he or she suffered minor cuts on the throat and face.

Battalion Chief Rick Berry said the incident was believed to have involved an individual experiment and not a class.

He said there was no contamination and the injuries were minor.

Mercy was unable to comment on the status of any patient who may or may not have been admitted due to the incident.

Sebelius' budget could cause steep tuition hike

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After two years of tuition increases, block-grant reductions and mid-year budget cuts, K-State is about to get hit again.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' budget recommendations, if approved in the Kansas House and Senate, would leave K-State's general fund with $7 million less than this year.

Inside, Page 5
K-State administrators address the issue of Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' financial plan for higher education in Kansas.

An 8 percent tuition increase would be required to compensate for the loss.

This is in addition to a double-digit tuition increase already scheduled in the five-year tuition plan.

In her State of the State address, Sebelius said, "because of our difficult financial time, we have failed to keep a promise made to the state's colleges and universities to provide funding to retain key faculty and minimize the need for tuition increases. My proposal fulfills that promise."

But that promise is not being fulfilled, Student Body President John O'Hara said.

"It's bleak," he said. "It's opposite of what's she is saying in the public."

The budget proposal mandates a 3-percent salary increase, as well as fringe benefit increases for all state employees – totaling $10 million for K-State. However, Sebelius is funding only half the money with state funds, leaving K-State with a $4.9 million bill.

Howard Dean expected to consider options on whether to remain in race

By Ron Fournier

Howard Dean trailed far behind, winless in 17 contests, his candidacy doomed less than a month after he stood atop the Democratic field. The fallen front-runner retreated to Vermont, where he will consider several options, including endorsing one of his rivals, advisers said.

Close race or not, Kerry said, "A win is a win."

Universities struggle with free-speech issues at games

Brent Miller likes to have a good time when he attends K-State athletic events.

A regular at basketball and football games, the graduate student in accounting goes with six to 10 of his friends hours before the games begin, to sit on the front row and for the chance to be heard.

"We're very vocal," Miller said. "We cheer for our team and help them out as much as we can."

Most of the time he and his friends playfully cheer on the Wildcats.

But sometimes, he said, the group can't help but let out their emotions – including certain obscenities – to the other team.

"We give the other team a hard time," Miller said. "That's part of the fun of it – to be able to heckle the coaches and players. We've gotten more than dirty looks from some of the coaches."

Colleges across the nation are struggling with free-speech issues at athletic events.

Students, such as those attending the University of Maryland, believe they have a constitutional right to say what they want – even if it includes obscenities.

College officials, though, have a different opinion.

At K-State, all fans must follow the same set of guidelines set forth by the Big 12 Conference Spectator Code of Sportsmanship, Tim Weiser, athletics director, said.

Under this code, fans are to avoid negative actions or words that dishonor teams, schools, and the Big 12.

Guidelines
Spectator guidelines from the Big 12 Spectator Code of Sportsmanship
- Develop an appreciation for fairness, openness, and support of coaches and players.
- Avoid negative comments and gestures that dishonor the teams, their schools and the Big 12.
- Treat spectators, players, coaches, and officials courteously, win or lose.

New study shows college AIDS outbreak

Illustration by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

The study, an analysis of a new HIV test conducted by the University of North Carolina, was released at the 11th annual Conference on Retroviruses and Opportunistic Infections last week.

The new test found 84 HIV cases in male students ages 18-30 from Jan. 1, 2000 through Dec. 31, 2003. All the students, except four, were enrolled in North Carolina colleges.

GRADE INFLATION

PROVIDENCE, R.I. – Six professors at Point Park University in Pittsburgh, Pa., saw their merit A-based bonuses cut in half because of alleged grade inflation this year, a move that has caused faculty to pursue unionization.

After reviewing grade reports, President Katherine Henderson approved bonus reductions for faculty members who awarded the majority of their students A grades.

The professors' merit-based bonuses were cut from $2,000 to $1,000.

POLITICAL NAKEDNESS

MINNEAPOLIS – A high of 28 degrees did not stop eight University of Minnesota students from donning their swimsuits to call for a tuition freeze Friday.

They and about 70 other university students and staff rallied outside McNamara Alumni Center after a Board of Regents meeting.

In an open letter to university administration and the regents, student Julia Rybak asked that the university's priorities be re-examined in the face of federal and state budget cuts.

Rybak said the rally was necessary because of a 108 percent increase in tuition over the past decade.

MAKE-OUT SESSION

HUNTINGTON, W.Va. – Some couples don't believe in public displays of affection, but Marshall University's student-run radio station found a few who were happy to kiss in front of the student body.

The kissing was scheduled to begin at noon but was delayed until 12:45 p.m. because of lack of participation.

Two more couples, including WMUL staff members, eventually signed up.

THE MOMENT OF TRUTH

A FUN, UNSCIENTIFIC QUIZ THAT MEANS ABSOLUTELY NOTHING

Do you drink too much?

1. On Thursday nights, you usually:
A. go to bed early to prepare for Friday's classes.
B. have dinner with friends and maybe order a drink or two.
C. can't recall. Thursday afternoon through Sunday night is usually a blur.

2. Your liver:
A. is clean, functional and healthy.
B. swells a little, but is keeping up with your recreational drinking.
C. will be defunct by your 30th birthday.

3. When you look at pictures from last week's party, you:
A. ask for a copy to show your mother.
B. ask for a copy to show your friends.
C. ask your friends to keep copies off www.collegehumor.com

4. A slippery nipple is:
A. gross. Why are we talking about areolas?
B. an alcoholic beverage.
C. a mixture of Bailey's and Sambuca, but it's a chick drink.

5. A 12-pack of beer is:
A. sometimes near the juice at convenience stores.
B. a nice way to break the ice with friends.
C. a nice start.

6. When you meet your significant other's parents, you:
A. drink a glass of purified water.

C. aren't that bad. Missouri is just a couple hours away.

10. A kegerator:
A. You mean refrigerator?
B. is a cool novelty.
C. is inconvenient only because you need someone else to pull the tap while you're lying underneath.

ANSWERS

■ If you answered mostly A's, you don't drink too much, but you also never will get laid.
■ If you answered mostly B's, you balance drinking and real life.
■ If you answered mostly C's, you might want to check into rehab and become a country singer. Your drinking is out of control.

Survivor of Central Park attack shares memories of event

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly 15 years after she was attacked, Trisha Meili still cannot remember the incident that would forever alter her life.

In fact, she cannot remember nearly six weeks of her recovery directly following the incident.

The survivor – Meili prefers the word survivor rather than "victim" – of the 1989 attack in Central Park said she remains optimistic about the ordeal.

While jogging in New York Central Park, she was brutally assaulted, raped and left for dead. She was in a coma for 12 days and was thought to have suffered brain damage.

In her speech at Union Forum Hall on Tuesday night, Meili told her tale of recovery based on three things: the importance of support from friends and family, pride in what you can do, rather than focus on what you can't, and recognizing the power of the present moment.

"Each of our lives is going to be affected by an event from which we doubt we are ever going to recover," Meili said.

She said these three things are crucial to overcoming such occurrences.

IMPORTANCE OF SUPPORT

Eighteen roses from Frank Sinatra.

These things, combined with the continual presence of her family, helped bring Meili through.

Even when she was in her coma, her parents and nurses read her letters to her and supported her.

PRIDE IN WHAT YOU DO

After months of physical therapy at Gaylord Hospital, a rehabilitation hospital in Wallingford, Conn. – where she now serves on the board – Meili came to a realization.

All one can control is the present.

Two-and-a-half months after learning to walk, on a hot Saturday morning in August, Meili's physical therapists convinced her to take a part in a special event put on by the Achilles Track Club.

The club is a worldwide organization aiding people with various disabilities in running.

Less than five months after being brutally attacked while running, the Central Park Jogger was going to run once again.

"It felt so good," she said "I felt like I was conquering the world."

Normally on Saturday mornings, Meili said she would jog six miles. On this Saturday, she struggled to jog the make-shift quarter-mile track through the parking lot of the hospital.

But she was not discouraged.

"Face your challenge, put one foot in front of the other, and before you know it, you're running."

Then, a man who she didn't know made a decision that would again change her life.

He decided to run the New York City Marathon in her honor. And so he did.

The next day, he immediately sent the medal to her. She carries it with her to this day.

Ironically, the final stretch of the marathon runs through Central Park – the site of her brutal attack only six years before.

"I had reclaimed my park," Meili said.

POWER OF THE PRESENT

"I wasn't spending my time thinking about what happened – about the past I cannot control."

Meili says this mentality is what has kept her from becoming negative – What has kept her from asking the question that would be on the tip of anyone's tongue in her situation.

Why me?

Meili said one thing that hung with her – even though she doesn't remember it happening – is something one of her nurses told her.

Why not?

"We're all faced with challenges that look like they're going to knock us down, but each one of us is capable of so much more than we believe."

Trisha Meili
CENTRAL PARK ATTACK SURVIVOR

Meili said she didn't know why she remained optimistic. She just always did.

Perhaps her inability to remember the ordeal has kept her from festering on the experience.

She is not perfect, however.

She still has some lingering effects from the incident, though she says they are subtle enough it becomes hard to pinpoint, but she still keeps her head up.

And, most importantly, she doesn't blame herself.

"We're all faced with challenges that look like they're going to knock us down, but each one of us is capable of so much more than we believe."

Counseling Services offers dating workshop

By Lara Hastings
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Single or taken, a dating workshop presented by University Counseling Services is for any student interested in learning more about relationships.

The workshop will be information and discussion based and will cover a broad range of topics concerning relationships.

Co-leaders Dana Wyner, counselor at Counseling Services, and Megan Brent, psychology intern at Counseling Services, will answer questions and cover general information topics, such as how to develop good communication skills, how to argue fairly and how to express positive and negative feelings.

"Discussion will be based on group interest," Wyner said.

The workshop will not only help single students think about the kind of person they want to date, but it also will help students build healthy relationships with their current partners.

Students' interest and suggestions persuaded UCS to create the dating workshop.

"It is also timely, in a way, with Valentines Day," Wyner said. "Students are thinking about dating."

The dating workshop also stems from other counseling groups Counseling Services offers weekly.

"It's important for people to know what group counseling is and why it is thought to work," Wyner said.

It also is a good way for students to connect with each other through a common interest.

A stress-management and two personal-growth groups are offered through Counseling Services.

The stress management group helps students learn and practice different strategies to handle anxiety and stress.

The personal growth groups cover such issues as romantic and family relationships, along with friendships and any other problems group members wish to talk about.

"We hope students will come in with a variety of problems to talk about," Barbara Pearson, psychologist at UCS, said.

Commission discusses public recreation center plan

Advisory board to gauge popularity of possible city recreational center

The Manhattan Parks and Recreation advisory board recommended to the commission Tuesday night the establishment of a task force on the issue of recreational quality of life in Manhattan.

Mayor Mark Taussig said the steering committee will look into the issue of recreation in our community.

Terry DeWeese, director of Parks and Recreation for the city of Manhattan, said the advisory board will ask the city to give it permission to look into the matter.

"We plan to establish a task force to examine what the community wants," DeWeese said,

He said the issues that arise will be determined by the people.

"I will say no matter what kind of plan we do, the recreation facility is something that has always surfaced in this community as something people want us to do," he said.

DeWeese said there no timetable for the task force to complete their work, but they would work diligently to accomplish it in a timely fashion.

"The purpose will be to take an inventory of the recreation needs for Manhattan," Taussig said.

"A part of what they will be looking at could be a recreation or aquatic center."

He said things like sports fields may be considered as well.

"We will look at any other recreational needs to guide us into the future," Taussig said.

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said he supports the idea of a community center.

"I think the community needs a family recreational facility," he said.

"It needs to be determined if the community wants it bad enough for everyone to pay for it through taxes and not just user fees."

Commissioner Brad Everett said he was less excited.

"Before I make a decision on the matter, I would like to see how much it is going to cost," Everett said.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said the issue first came up in a study done by the city in the year 2000.

"We did an indoor facility study in 2000, which has a great deal of information about community interest and ability to pay for it," Snead said.

Snead said it was important to refresh the study and determine the needs, which the task force would do.

He said the location of the facility, if considered, has yet to be determined.

"I think this is a needed facility," Snead said.

"But I think the vote of the citizens on a quality of life bond issue is a good way to evaluate the demand."

K-State community needs to protest budget

It's time to take a stand.

In her budget recommendations, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius wants to take money from tuition and privilege fee funds and dump them in a general state account.

That means the money students pay for Lafene Health Center or on-campus housing could end up paying for a new road in Western Kansas or subsidizing social programs.

This is just a way to tax college students, who have already been slapped with double-digit tuition increases in the last two years.

It's a dangerous precedent where student money is no longer safe.

There is still a chance to fight for student and faculty before they are swallowed up in the state budget holes.

As the recommendations proceed through the House and Senate, we expect the K-State administration to use its power and influence to guard these funds.

Student and faculty senators need to attend State Education Day in Topeka on Monday to ensure legislators know the dangers of approving this budget.

In addition, students and faculty need direction from their respective leadership for an organized effort that will make the biggest influence.

If the K-State community doesn't speak up now, the governor will speak for us.

CLASH OF THE COLUMNISTS

Clash of the columnists is a weeklong series in which writers take opposing views on issues of the day.

Learning to speak

Grammar oppresses different English dialects

PAUL RESTIVO

Grammar sucks.

I write this knowing Jonathan Lamb, in the column next to me, is writing in a much more sophisticated form than this Missourian.

I also write this as a future teacher of English. I also write this intending to end sentences with prepositions, split some infinitives, and begin sentences with awkward introductory clauses.

With No Child Left Untested, er, Left Behind, some standards require students know traditional rules of grammar in secondary schools – grades nine through 12.

Will administrators walk in and find me teaching it? Never.

I have one reason.

Oppression.

Grammar oppresses. It is something I discovered in my Missouri suburban high school and was reinforced during a linguistics course here at K-State. (Some of the following ideas are taken from linguistics professor Tom Murray and passed on as my own.)

Remember Christopher Columbus? You know, the guy who sailed in 1492 to a barren America? Yeah, there were some Native Americans, but he killed most of them.

Columbus colonized the residents of the new America and forced a language on them that was unfamiliar. This language would become standard. The only way for Columbus to survive in this nation was to convey the traditional rules of his language to the people of this nation – thus oppressing them.

And here we are today – the English language oppressing blacks, American Indians, Southerners, New Englanders, Midwesterners and all the rest. There is no formal way to speak the language.

To force one way on students in the classroom is ignorant and oppressive. If one "correct" type of English is taught, it creates a reality in which those who speak correctly are in control of society. It was the strategy in England in the 15th century to establish one standard way of speaking – the language of the king.

Why?

If the people you govern are not speaking your language, they're going to be a little tough to control. If people cannot understand what the king is saying, the king cannot control their communication.

Just look at this country. Those who speak Ebonics, use slang, or just common English are not in control in this society. We can make exceptions with one of our presidents (e.g. Mr. Bush), but he is ridiculed more for his speech mishaps than anything else. Therefore, proper, grammatical English is a hierarchical divider. (Please pause for a minute because I don't usually use big words like that.)

To this day, the United States has not established a national language. So why are we teaching one correct way to speak English? Does it make sense to teach traditional English grammar in Manhattan when our city's own high school contains a demographic of students who, combined, speak more than 50 languages?

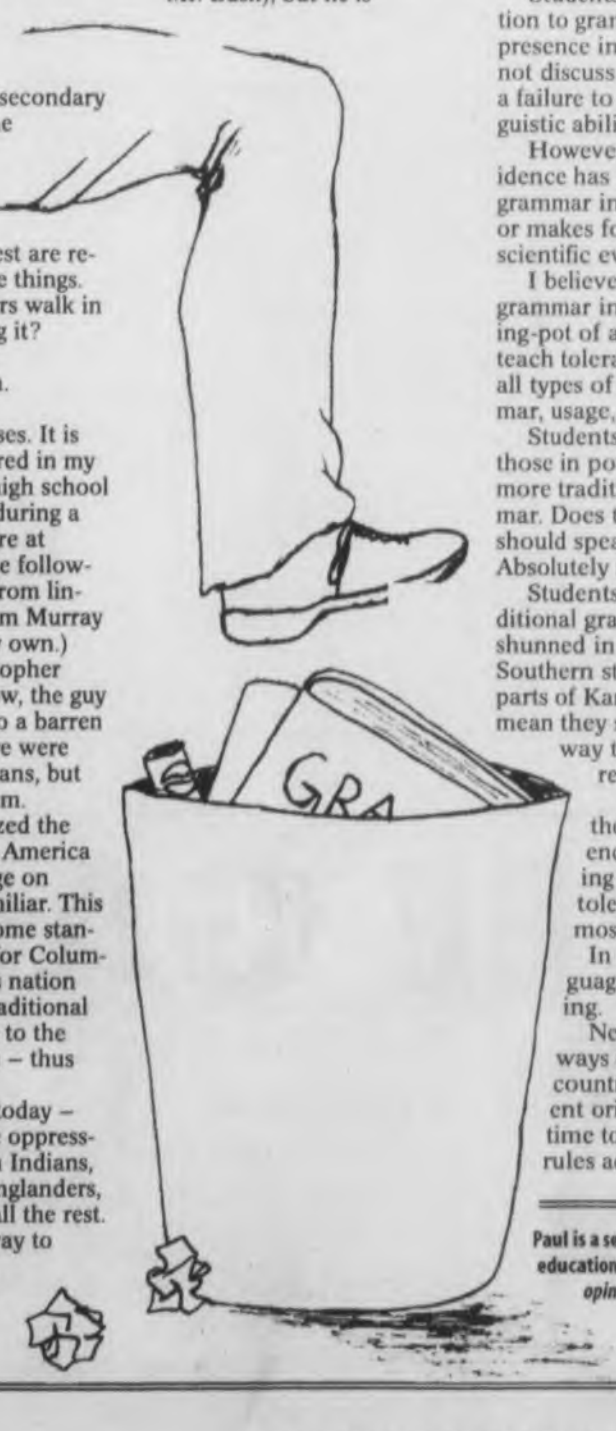
To answer the question of how I will get away with not teaching traditional grammar, this is the best I have come up with:

Students should pay attention to grammar. It will have a presence in my classroom. To not discuss grammar would be a failure to develop their linguistic abilities.

However, no substantial evidence has proven studying grammar increases test scores or makes for better writing. No scientific evidence.

I believe in order to study grammar in this growing melting-pot of a society, we need to teach tolerance. Tolerance of all types of language – grammar, usage, style, syntax, etc.

Students should know those in power tend to use a more traditional type of grammar. Does this mean they should speak only this way? Absolutely not.



Students should know traditional grammar may be shunned in some parts of our Southern states, or even in parts of Kansas. Does this mean they should change the way they speak in these regions? Again, no.

But knowing these language differences exist and knowing they need to be tolerated is what is most important.

In this country, language is always changing.

New dialects are always emerging. This is a country with many different origins. Maybe it is time to set some language rules acknowledging this.

Grammar essential to learn how language works

JONATHAN LAMB

I'm going to intentionally commit five grammatical errors in this column.

I've already committed one, and most of you didn't even notice. And after rereading the first sentence, many still don't.

Why am I making this foolish decision, one that conflicts with my very existence? Because, though I am arguing in favor of teaching grammar after elementary school, I maintain that grammar is not a set of rules.

So what is it, then? To think of grammar legalistically, as an ethics of linguistic activity, is to be in entirely the wrong state of mind. Indeed, grammar – and language more broadly – is more like basketball than it is like the Ten Commandments.

Bear with me here.

Let's say I have a friend who doesn't know how to play basketball.

Don't ask me why he doesn't know, he just doesn't.

Maybe he's from another country. Maybe he chose to revolt against the oppressively masculine values of his own culture by refusing even to watch the enslavement that is team sports. Point is, he can't ball.

How would I teach my friend – let's call him Pansy Boy – how to play basketball? We'd go to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, check out a ball and make our way to a goal. I'd begin with the basics: dribbling, shooting, off-the-backboard windmill jams.

As he acclimated to the game, I would introduce some of the more advanced points: crossover dribbles, talking smack and flirting with women on the sideline while waiting to sub in.

I would also teach him the technical rules, like traveling, out of bounds and the point values of shots.

But what I certainly wouldn't do is take Pansy Boy into a small room and explain to him, using only words and an easel, the rules of basketball. If I did, he would never learn how to play.

Language works very much the same. Despite what you may have been told, the true reason for teaching grammar is to teach how language works.

Yet perhaps because of our Puritan heritage of legalism or our scholastic heritage of rigid logical structure, we have come to think teaching grammatical statutes is the same as teaching language. We make the mistake of learning the rules without learning how to play.

It is a sorry case of missing the forest (language) for a single tree (grammar).

Just as drawing a 3-point arc on the chalkboard does not teach Pansy Boy how to actually shoot a 3-pointer, neither does explaining split infinitives teach students how to use infinitives, split or otherwise.

And just as sitting at a desk and reading Pansy Boy the basketball rule book is far from teaching him to play basketball, so too is forcing students to memorize grammatical rules far from teaching them how to "play," or use, language.

Does this mean we should stop teaching students about grammar? By no means! It simply means we should teach grammar in the proper circumstances. Three factors are involved in doing so.

First, we should teach grammar much earlier. My mother, herself a language-arts teacher, tells me by the time she reached ninth grade, she had been forced to diagram thousands of sentences. The sooner students learn the basic structures of language, the sooner they can stop worrying about them.

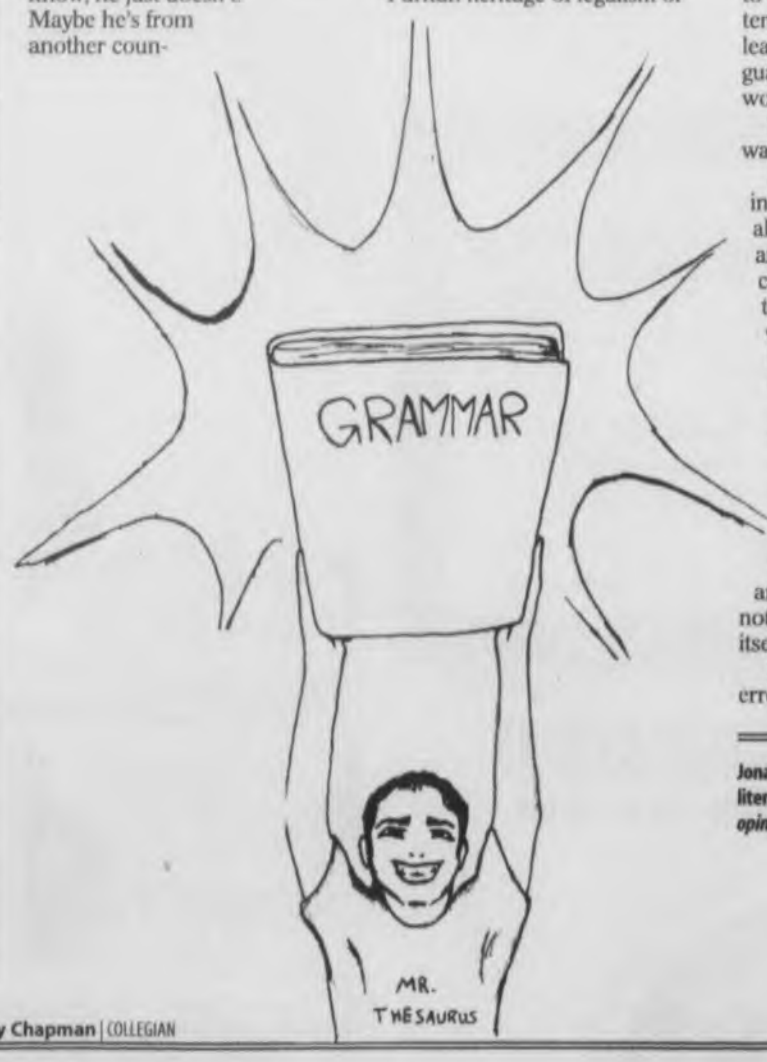
Dickens' "Bleak House" is an infinitely more thorough tutorial on language, not to mention an engagement with issues of culture, power, value and love, than a subject-verb agreement worksheet could ever be.



It's a grammar lesson waiting to happen.

And finally, as I said when I began, we should not teach grammar as if it is a series of immutable edicts passed down from on high. It isn't.

Or rather, it ain't. The rules are part of the game; they are not the game itself.

Now, did you spot all five errors?

Governor's budget would hurt K-State

Editor,

Since Gov. Sebelius' State of the State address, we have worked with faculty leaders, deans and others to analyze the effect of her budget and to develop initial strategies to address the challenges and opportunities contained within her recommendations.

The Kansas Board of Regents has stated its support of the Governor's budget recommendations, and we echo that support. However, the Regents also recognized the importance of discussing the implications of those recommendations.

We should also point out these budget challenges are not unique to K-State. The other Regents universities are facing similar challenges.

We want to assure you that we are doing everything possible to work our way through this situation, and we are continuing our discussion with legislative committees.

K-STATE'S GENERAL USE BUDGET

The General Use budget is the focal point of discussions in campus, Regents and legislative settings. Our $256.3 million General Use budget is primarily supported by state appropriations and tuition revenue.

Over the past two years, a combination of unfunded budget obligations and reductions to our state appropriations block grant has created a $13 million hole in our General Use budget. When the recommendations for the coming year are reflected, this amounts to about 8 percent of our budget.

The Manhattan and Salina campuses, as well as our College of Veterinary Medicine, were able to address this problem using a combination of new tuition revenue and budget recalls. Our agricultural research and extension operations were forced to rely heavily on budget reductions since these programs have no tuition revenue.

K-State's and the Regents budget priority has always been employee salaries. The governor recognized that priority by recommending a salary increase package for all state employees.

When those policy decisions are applied to our current General Use budget and mandated increases in fringe benefits such as health insurance are considered, we will be about $6.9 million short of having sufficient funds for next year.

We have been able to help offset budget shortfalls of recent years by relying on additional tuition revenue. While this was certainly not our intention as we began tuition ownership several years ago, access to this revenue stream has prevented a truly calamitous situation.

At this point, we believe we will be able to avoid university-wide budget recalls for the Manhattan, Salina and Veterinary Medicine campuses by using additional revenue from tuition increases for Fiscal Year 2005. The specifics of that package are being developed, and we are making every effort to keep next year's tuition increase below 20 percent.

Unfortunately, our agricultural research and extension operations will once again face significant budgetary reductions for the coming year because of the lack of tuition revenue.

K-STATE'S RESTRICTED USE BUDGET

Our Restricted Use budget of about $275 million is funded from a variety of sources, such as grants and contracts, housing fees, student health fees and other fees for services.

Traditionally, our Restricted Use budget has been planned and managed on campus and has not received a great deal of attention by the Regents or in the Legislature.

This year, the tradition of total local control of Restricted Use funds has been broken because the governor has recommended $2.5 million be swept into the state treasury.

Although our attorneys and others assure us the governor's recommendation in this area is legal, we are very concerned for this precedent need to recall the $2.5 million in Restricted Use funds from entities such as student housing, student health and other restricted use sources, such as research overhead funds.

The governor has indicated some of these lost funds will not be needed because of efficiencies expected to accrue through recommendations of the Budget Efficiency Savings Team.

At this point, we have not been provided any information showing how such savings would be realized, and so we must conclude we will experience a loss of purchasing power.

TUITION WAIVERS

Finally, we want to address another issue raised in recent months. The Fort Hays State University requested Regents approval of a tuition waiver program for faculty/staff spouses and dependents.

After lengthy review and discussion, in January of 2004, the Regents told FHSU it would not approve the tuition waiver program.

We clearly understand and appreciate the desire for such a program. However, we need to ensure when such a program is implemented, it is at a level that is manageable financially and the trade-offs are understood by all the stake-holders – and that it is approved by the Regents.

Within the past few weeks, a bill was introduced in the Kansas Legislature to authorize a tuition waiver program for dependents/spouses of faculty and staff at any Regents university. Each Regents university was asked by the state's Division of the Budget to provide a fiscal note for that bill.

Actual enrollment data indicated that K-State would have lost about $1 million in tuition revenue and an additional $180,000 in privilege fee revenue this fiscal year.

This loss of revenue would add to the budget shortfall described previously.

It is difficult to estimate the fiscal impact of the other portion of the tuition waiver bill – the portion requiring us to write off tuition/fees for spouses/dependents of employees of the other Regents universities who attend K-State. Since we have no excess capacity to teach additional students, we would need to add faculty – thereby exacerbating further our budget challenge. It is reasonable to believe the fiscal impact of the tuition waiver bill could exceed $2 million.

SUMMARY

We want to assure you we are doing everything possible to work our way through this situation, and we are continuing our discussion with legislative committees. Again, we do not believe it will be necessary to recall funds from campus units to balance next year's General Use budget for the Main Campus, Salina and Veterinary Medicine. We must recognize, however, that reliance on tuition revenue to help balance our university budget over the past few years means that we will not be able to accomplish some of the quality improvements originally intended when we adopted our five-year tuition plan

U.N. inspectors discover weapons in Iran, not Iraq

Editor,

The bold headline on Page 3 of Friday's Collegian brings the startling revelation: "U.N. inspectors discover weapons drawings in Iraq."

This will come as welcome news to faithful holdouts for the credibility of President Bush – so long as they don't bother to read the Associated Press story that follows.

This turns out to be entirely about developments in Iran.

Yes, I confess, there's only a tiny error: one wee letter.

Still, considering the implications of the controversy over weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, the misimpression with which this leaves the casual reader seems a mite irresponsible.

To be sure, we should allocate some responsibility for any lasting misunderstanding to the casual reader herself or himself. But then, the headline editor seems to be an instance of this category of reader. How dizzying.

On the other hand, it could be we have a Freudian slip.

That would raise some interesting questions about the wishes of the headline writer.

But perhaps it's just a question of geographical confusion. And there does indeed seem to be some honorable precedent in our land for this sort of innocence.

On Sept. 24, 2001, President George W. Bush held a joint press conference with the Prime Minister of Canada, in the course of which he informed the world that "Border relations between Canada and Mexico have never been better."

At first, you might wonder in just what sense this one might have been a "joint press conference." But actually, if you think about it, the president's striking claim was (and is) true. Of course the same goes for the equally attention-getting contention that "Border relations between Canada and Mexico have never been worse" – as it does for the somewhat less interesting proposition that "Border relations between Canada and Mexico have never been."

The good-neighbor news about Canada and Mexico was almost as comforting as learning that, finally, evidence of an active nuclear weapons program had been turned up in Iraq. It was also evidence (like the headline in question) that not all of us inhabit the same planet.

Still, let's not lose hope. Gradually, we may all be brought to situate ourselves in roughly the same world. After all, as Ambrose Bierce observed, "War is God's way of teaching geography to Americans."

Parting caution: the AP reports the diplomats who conveyed the inspectors' findings "emphasized that, despite putting into question Iran's pledge to be fully open, the find did not advance suspicions that Tehran was trying to make nuclear weapons."

Random thoughts on KSU sports

NABIL SHAHEEN

Random thoughts from a random mind about random topics in the world of sports:

■ When will this snow and ice stop? Running at the chester E. Peters Recreation Complex certainly has its benefits, but I want to get back outside. That 1/8-mile track is nice, warm, cushioned and certainly a great alternative during these cold winter months, but it can't compare with running the sidewalks, streets and trails of Manhattan.

■ Congratulations to the 190 student-athletes at K-State who were named the fall 2003 Big 12 Commissioner's Honor Roll. My goodness, what an accomplishment for all 190, but especially the 30 who earned a 4.0 last semester.

■ Am I the only one feeling like an underachiever here?

■ For those who have yet to take in a women's basketball game this season, please get out to Bramlage Coliseum and watch this team play. You only have two more chances – Feb. 25 and March 3. Not only is the atmosphere unbelievable, but this could be one of your last chances to see our talented-beyond-words senior center Nicole Ohlde in a Wildcat uniform. The other 13 who play with her are ridiculously good and very fun to watch as well.

■ For those growing impatient with our men's team, I ask that you please let down your guard a little bit and give these guys your support regardless of what happens. Yes, they've had some blowouts. Yes, they've lost some ridiculously close ones. But they've won some great games, too. They haven't given up on you, so don't give up on them. Reloading is easy; rebuilding is not.

■ If you want to see dedication, stick around after any men's practice, and you'll see freshman guard Dez Willingham stay on the court well after his teammates have left, fine tuning his shot, perfecting his game and rehabbing that injured shoulder. It's pretty amazing that this guy is only a freshman, and this entire recruiting class is going to be something else as the maturing process continues.

■ Not since Nike's Bracketville has there been as sweet a sports commercial as Adidas' "Impossible Is Nothing" campaign. Whether in the print format or on TV, they are awesome and give me goose bumps every time.

■ Purple Power Hour is one of the coolest student-produced shows I have ever seen. Created and run by electronic journalism students here on campus, the show has a little bit of everything that is K-State sports and can be seen monthly on Channel 8 here in Manhattan. The first episode had viewers in Kendra Wecker's house, along with her roommates Megan Mahoney, Laurie Koehn and Ohlde, to give us a tour of the house and their phat rides, a la MTV Cribs. Last episode gave viewers an inside look at K-State baseball and new coach Brad Hill.

■ Maybe ol' Joe Paterno was right after all. The NCAA recently said Big Ten Conference games might be getting a form of instant replay in their contests. As a guy who grew up in Big Ten country, I'm kind of excited. But as a college football fan, I'm kind of scared. Regardless of what happens, it should be interesting to see where this might lead.

Well, that's about it. Oh, and happy trails to Marc Dunn, Tank Reese and Frank Murphy, who all are on their way to Berlin, Germany, to play in NFL Europe. Coach Bill Snyder's influence on football has now truly gone global.

Men's golf team finishes 5th, posts high individual scores in 1st tournament

By Marshall Ice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's golf team finished fifth in its first tournament of the spring season.

"It was a good start," Coach Tim Norris said. "We had never played this golf course before, and we had not hit off of grass in three weeks."

Georgia College and State, Ohio State and Francis Marion rounded out the top five. Big 12 rival, Missouri, was sixth.

The Tigers were followed by Virginia Commonwealth, Florida Southern, Lynn University and Louisville

The Cats entered the final day of the tournament in fourth place out of 15 the schools in the tournament.

K-State's Matt Van Cleave hit a final-round 70 to finish in the top 10. Florida Southern's Greg Koch had the best individual score at 211.

Van Cleave led the Cats with a team-best 215 and finished tied for seventh place among individuals. The junior improved in each of the last two rounds, having shot 73-72-70.

"He is has picked up where he left off last fall," Norris said of Van Cleave.

"He has a lot of confidence and is just a really tough competitor. He wants to win and help our team get better.

Competitiveness is a trait possessed by each of the Cats.

"There is a lot of competition within in the team," Norris said. "That helps you get better.

All five K-State players were able to post competitive scores.

"It was a good top to bottom performance," Norris said of the Matlock.

"Our worst score was 225 and that stacked up favorably against all the other teams.

Moody had opened 76-72. Douglas started 74-75.

K-State's next tournament is the Beau Chene Collegiate Classic Monday Feb. 23-Tuesday Feb. 24. The tournament will be played at the Beau Chene Country Club in Mandeville, La.

"It will be a short turnaround and then off to Louisiana," Norris said.

New ESPN reality show to debut Sunday

Sports enthusiasts have mixed opinions about program, 'Dream Job'

By Levi Wolters
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The reality television phenomenon has crept its way into the world of sports.

ESPN's "Dream Job," debuting 9 p.m. Sunday, will feature 12 wannabe sports anchors vying for a one-year contract to host ESPN's "Sportscenter."

According to the show's Web site, 10,000 applicants from 29 cities across the country auditioned to become one of the 11 finalists, with another finalist coming from a special "Wild Card" competition.

Soren Petro, spokesman for the show's sponsor, Labatt Blue, and host of "The Program" on Sports Radio WHB-AM 810, was on-hand for the auditions at Johnny's Tavern in Overland Park, Kan., on Oct. 16.

"I was amazed by the different types of people on-hand," Petro said. "All of them were sports fans, and it would have been great for them to get a chance to work in the field, but the talent just wasn't there for most of them."

The 12 finalists, ranging from coast to coast, will compete in areas such as play-by-play, sideline reporting, anchoring, and one-on-one interviews.

A combination of judges and viewer votes will narrow the competitors by one each week, until only two are left. The winner will be determined on a special two-hour finale on March 28.

Aaron Good, freshman in architectural engineering, is one of the many long-time fans of ESPN not happy with the network falling into the realm of reality TV.

"I'm not going to watch it," Good said. "To me, it's the worst thing to come to television since NASCAR."

"People have the opportunity to watch other people all day long. Instead, they choose to come home and watch even dumber people interact on television."

ESPN has made no secret it is striving to entertain with sports, not just inform.

After recent success with the drama-series "Playmakers," as well as day time shows "Around the Horn" and "Pardon the Interruption," ESPN has begun to break from the normal statistics and scores to which sports fans have grown accustomed.

"I think it's a great thing," Eric Morrah, freshman in open-option, said. "I loved 'Playmakers.' It shows that ESPN is more than just 'Sportscenter.' It shows that the network is versatile. I'm feeling it."

"All I watch are games and sports programming," Petro said. "I think reality TV sucks, but I'll watch this because it deals with sports."

Even with the winner of the competition getting a nearly free ride to the top of the sports media world, Petro said he won't hold a jealous grudge some of the people in his line of work might have.

"It's a really cool idea," Petro said. "To me, if you work hard, the money and success will come.

"If the contestants are passionate about their work, it's a great opportunity, even if only for a year."

CFB | Former Colorado player says she was raped

A female placekicker says she was raped by a teammate at the University of Colorado four years ago but didn't tell police because she was too frightened — another hit to the scandal-plagued football program.

Katie Hnida makes the allegation in the upcoming edition of Sports Illustrated. She issued a statement Tuesday through the University of New Mexico, where she is a student, saying she was "healing" from "horrors endured" at Colorado. The statement does not mention rape, and she says she does not plan to press charges.

The allegation comes after three weeks of stunning allegations involving the Colorado football program. Three women have sued the school in federal court, saying they were raped by players or recruits at or after an off-campus party in December 2001.

The governor has urged the university to take action and an independent panel has been chosen to put together a report by April 30 on recruiting practices. University officials have denied Keenan's allegations.

NBA | Bulls waive Jay Williams after accident

Williams

The Chicago Bulls waived guard Jay Williams on Tuesday, two weeks after reaching a contract buyout with the guard whose career is in jeopardy following a motorcycle accident.

NBA rules require a player to be put on waivers after a team and the player make a settlement on their contract.

The buyout was worth about $3 million. Williams had two more years worth about $7.7 million left on his original deal.

Williams was riding a new motorcycle last June 19 when the bike got away from him and slammed into a utility pole.

He severed a main nerve in his leg, fractured his pelvis and tore three of the four main ligaments in his left knee. He spent two weeks at a Chicago hospital before being transferred to Duke University Medical Center, where he has been rehabbing.

CBB | UNLV coach resigns, citing health reasons

"I am physically unable to do this right now," Spoonhour, 64, said in a statement. "Because of my health it is in my best interest to step away. It has nothing to do with basketball or anything surrounding the program."

The Runnin' Rebels (12-9) have lost three straight games, including a 94-60 rout at Missouri on Sunday.

A search for a new head coach will begin immediately, athletic department officials said.

Spoonhour is the second coach to resign for health reasons in the last month. On Jan. 28, Rick Majerus took a leave of absence at Utah, citing heart problems. He later said he would not return to Utah.

Video games still popular among students

By Christopher Harrop
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most children, once they have learned to ride a bicycle without training wheels, are happy to let that and other relics of childhood fall by the wayside. For an increasing number of adolescents, the video game is one childhood relic that stays with them.

Game consoles have changed with the times.

Older students and adults started by plugging a game cartridge in to play on the Atari VCS/2600 (1977) or ColecoVision (1982). Back then, the phenomenon reached people of many ages.

"I remember my old high school teacher talking about playing video games," Trent Smith, senior in anthropology, said.

Other students came of age with the Nintendo Entertainment System (1986), Nintendo Game Boy (1989) and 16-bit Sega Genesis (1989).

Those consoles released successor (Nintendo's Super NES and Sega's Saturn) that gave way to the eventual trendsetter, Sony's Playstation (1995).

Today, Sony's Playstation 2 is locked in competition with Microsoft's Xbox console and Nintendo's GameCube. Regardless of the console, more adolescents are refusing to give up their favorite pastime.

"I think it's important to recognize that video games as a form of recreation are appealing to people, not just children," Zachary McClure, K-State graduate, said.

In the age when reality television and heavy dramas permeate most news media, the video game remains a prime example of an interactive, entertaining escape from school and work.

Deke Nolan, senior in marketing and campus representative for EA Sports, said the competitive nature of video games contributes heavily to the continued desire to game into adulthood.

"It's the ability to still compete with another person, a way to challenge another person," Nolan said.

Nolan is one of the many individuals in the K-State community who promotes video games to college crowds. Tournaments at bars, greek houses and residence halls are commonplace for him, including a Playstation 2 tournament at 8 tonight at BoWinkle's Sports Bar.

Other competitive video-game events around campus have included the License to Kill: "007 GoldenEye" tournaments for the Nintendo 64 console, as well as LAN parties hosted by various gamers to play popular computer games, such as "Half-Life: Counter Strike," "Battlefield 1942" and "Unreal Tournament."

The entertainment factor for video games has reached epic proportions – not only due to the quality of games, but also their marketability.

"They're making them for all ages."

One of the more interesting by-products of a matured gaming community is "Red vs. Blue," a series of shorts using video games to act out scripts.

The style now labeled "machinima," are downloaded by millions of Internet users as each new episode is released.

While one is unlikely to find the episodes on television anytime soon, two full seasons are available for purchase on DVD.

Another reason for the popularity of video games among young adults is the mature content upon which many of today's games center.

While a number of video-game titles are available with younger gamers in mind, the majority of titles released are for teens and adults with adult themes and content.

"I think 'The Sims' is an example of adult themes," McClure said of the simulation game released by Electronic Arts.

"It's completely counter-intuitive for 'The Sims' to be popular if video games are just for children."

Whether it stems from the supply of such games by developers or the outcry of demand from gamers, the highest-selling video games are reaching out for mature players.

Visiting a friend's house in elementary school to play video games during the afternoon.

Now, those children are in high school, college and beyond – and instead of going to a friend's house, they organize massive game tournaments.

While many people have different reasons for continuing their gaming ways, Nolan said he felt that when it comes to gaming into adulthood, there is still a desire in people "to be a champ."

CELEB NEWS

Neeson to face Batman

Liam Neeson, the Irish actor who won acclaim in "Schindler's List" and the two recent "Star Wars" prequels, is in negotiations to play an unnamed villain in the next "Batman" movie. The actor will be joined by Christian Bale as Bruce Wayne/Batman, Katie Holmes as Wayne's love interest, Michael Caine as Alfred the butler, and Morgan Freeman, a businessman at Wayne Enterprises.

Neeson

The movie's present working title is "Batman: Intimidation," and the project will be spearheaded by "Insomnia" and "Memento" director Christopher Nolan.

The movie will be based on Frank Miller's graphic novels, and Warner Bros. remains tight-lipped about the film's opening date.

Ozzy on the road

Rocker-turned-reality TV show star Ozzy Osbourne announced this week that he will headline this summer's Ozzfest.

Osbourne

The rocker, who is recovering from a near-fatal ATV crash last year, will perform with Judas Priest, Slayer and Slipknot at the popular heavy metal musicfest. Osbourne founded Ozzfest in 1996.

This year's tour will kick off in early July.

The Osbourne family has managed to make headlines recently with the success of their reality television show and son Jack Osbourne's public bout with substance abuse. In addition, it recently was announced that wife/mother Sharon Osbourne's TV talk show would not be renewed for a second season because of low ratings.

Scorsese to have 'Affairs'

Trying to follow on the heels of the success of 2002's "Gangs of New York," film director Martin Scorsese is in talks with Warner Bros. to create "Internal Affairs," a movie about the seedy Hong Kong underworld.

Scorsese

The movie is about a police officer who becomes involved in a Hong Kong mob as part of an investigation.

At the same time, a mob mole enters the police force and works his way up in rank.

Scorsese says both Brad Pitt (who is appearing in the epic "Troy" this summer) and wife Jennifer Aniston have expressed interest in being involved with her husband's movie.

Brawl ends in stitches

Actor Kiefer Sutherland went to the hospital to receive six stitches on his face after getting into a barroom brawl.

Sutherland

Sutherland has received a Golden Globe Award and an Emmy nomination for his portrayal of an agent who repeatedly must save the world in one day.

Sutherland's spokesman declined to comment on the scuffle, only saying that Sutherland was "defending himself."

Commission denies Habitat land

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City Commissioners voted 5-0 Tuesday night against donating two different plots of land to the Manhattan Habitat for Humanity.

Elise Lambert, executive director of Habitat, said she recommended the Commission make affordable housing a priority, considering the lack of remaining plots of land for Habitat.

"We are down to one last plot, which we will begin working on as soon as we donate the house we are almost completed with," Lambert said.

The motion to donate one plot, located at the 900 block of Riley Lane, was considered but failed. The decision was to negotiate with Control Engineering to construct a plumbing, heating and air-conditioning shop within 24 months.

One house, the second-to-last plot remaining for Habitat, will be presented to the new homeowner on Sunday.

Commissioners also consented to allowing Manhattan Parks and Recreation Advisory Board to complete a task force of "quality of life" issues.

The advisory board may consider a recreational center for the city and citizens spoke in favor of the possibility.

David Sexton, resident and coach of the Manhattan Marlins Swim Team, said he was excited about the possibility of a center with an indoor swimming pool.

"We have needed a rec center, and I am excited to think of all the things that may come with it," he said.

WISCONSIN | John Kerry wins Democratic primary

He pledged to campaign in each of the 10 states holding primaries or caucuses March 2, including California, New York and Ohio, and awarding 1,151 delegates, more than half the total needed to claim the nomination.

The North Carolina lawmaker's breakout was fueled by the highest Republican turnout of the primary season and voters who made their decision in the last week. His deepest support was in the GOP suburbs of Milwaukee.

"That's been happening in other primaries, too," Edwards told the Associated Press in an interview. "Republicans who would consider voting Democratic and independents are the people we have to win over to win the general election. That's why I'm the best candidate to take on George Bush."

Kerry held a wide lead in pre-election polls, but the surveys did not fully reflect voter sentiments after a statewide debate Sunday, Edwards' criticism of Kerry's free-trade policies and two newspaper endorsements for Edwards. Nor did the polls take into account 11th-hour attacks on Kerry from Bush's re-election team.

"We underwent a lot of Republican attacks the last week. Notwithstanding those attacks, we showed we can fight back," Kerry told the AP.

"We're winning in every state across the country," he said. "We're going to win the nomination."

EXPLOSION | Department to investigate safety procedures

Ortiz said a flask exploded during a routine procedure involving a vacuum system.

"The procedure just involved collecting some solvents at a very low temperature," he said. "There was no chemical explosion-it was probably caused by a pressure differential."

Ortiz said there was no fire involved.

"This probably has no implications for our safety procedures," he said. "It could have happened to anyone using vacuum equipment."

Ortiz said a full investigation is being undertaken by the safety officers within the department.

"I can state without any hesitation that there was no concern pertaining to any kind of hazardous materials," he said.

After surveying the lab, Ortiz said he did not notice any extensive damage to the room or its contents, other than the flask involved in the explosion.

Steven Galitzer, director of the Department of Health and Safety, said that to his knowledge, the individual was working properly within the fume hood which prevented him or her from sustaining further injury.

"The individual was working with an ether compound, and at this point, that's all I know," Galitzer said.

— Bailey Basinger contributed to this story.

The code also states fans must treat spectators, players, coaches and officials courteously.

"It's not a right to come to an athletic event," Weiser said. "It's a privilege."

To enforce the code, K-State officials announce its guidelines before athletic events.

In addition, the university has staff on-hand at each athletic event to do crowd-control.

Jeff Steele, assistant athletics director for event management, said a staff of about 40 to 50 Bramlage Coliseum employees work during basketball games to take care of crowd problems.

"If problems arise, a fan usually is given a warning by a staff member and is notified of the inappropriate action or language. If the problem persists, the fan is escorted out.

On average, Steele said, one-third of all ejections are for inappropriate behavior.

The staff reports about eight ejections per year, he said, and averages about 40 to 50 warnings a game.

Basketball games tend to have fewer problems then football games due to the environment.

"The make-up of the the crowd is significantly different," Steele said. "In and of itself, it's a little less of a discipline problem because you're indoors."

Women's basketball games, Steele said, tend to have the least amount of problems, mainly because of the fan demographics.

Compared to other schools in the nation, Steele and Weiser said K-State fans do a good job of cheering for the team rather than ragging on the opposition.

BUDGET | Tuition, privilege fees may be forfeited

In addition, the governor is recommending $2 million in efficiency cuts from tuition revenue and general fund accounts, which brings the total budget gap to $6.9 million.

"They looked at several things we purchased and assessed we would save about 10 percent," said Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement. "I look forward to word from the state on how we can accrue that."

O'Hara said taking money from tuition to put in the state's general fund – used for funding roads, social services, etc. – is unprecedented.

"This is something that's never been done before," he said.

Not only is Sebelius suggesting taking away tuition revenue, but also is planning to sweep $2.5 million from restricted funds, or privilege fees, that fund student health, housing and research overhead.

"Our student fees that are going for student housing and Lafene are going to be put in the state general fund, which can be used for highway transportation or any other state-supported agency," O'Hara said. "It's going to the state general fund for all citizens. I would have thought privilege fees and tuition were safe."

O'Hara said he plans to meet with the state attorney general to determine the legality of taking tuition and restricted fees for general state use.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said the university's attorney has looked into the proposal and initially determined it was legal.

With so many budget cuts looming, administrators will have to adjust tuition rates.

"To do everything we want to do in our plan for next year, we would have to plan on a 22 percent increase," O'Hara said. "I've been working with our administration. A 22-percent increase doesn't work for everyone."

Rawson said the 14 or 15 percent increase discussed last fall won't be possible if the governor's recommendations are approved.

"I think it's going to have to be higher," he said. "Things have changed since then. We are hoping to keep it under 20 percent, and I think that's possible."

Tuition rate recommendations will be determined in late March or early April, and presented at the Kansas Board of Regents meeting in May.

The effect of these recommendations is worse in the context of the last three years, Rawson said, which has left K-State with a $20 million budget cut.

"We've been forced to use tuition revenue to offset those losses," Rawson said. "We have to do that again this year."

The 2006 budget does not look any better, with an extra pay period costing Regents institutions $12.5 million. Despite the outlook, O'Hara said President Jon Wefald has said there will be no more large tuition increases after the university completes its five-year plan.

Students can be reassured, Wefald said, that K-State will take care of tuition revenue.

"We work with students on how we are allocating funds," he said. "We are going to be good guardians of those funds."

K-State administrators said they have been assured by state officials that the restricted fee cuts will not become a tradition.

"The staff has assured us that it's a one-time deal," Rawson said. "It's something that has not been done much. We are concerned about the precedent that sets."

To prevent the budget recommendations from being approved as they read now, O'Hara said students and faculty must take a stand.

"We have to get the word out to the Kansas Senate," he said. "This is an opportunity for students and faculty alike to show this is a very dangerous precedent to set.

"I voted for Governor Sebelius because I felt she would support higher education. I oppose her in the way she is taking tuition and restricted fees from students who are already experiencing a burden."

Wefald said the administration, despite supporting portions of Sebelius' recommendations, also sympathizes with students and faculty.

"What kind of reaction can you have to this besides it's very mixed," he said. "We agree with students and faculty that this is a tough way of doing business.

"For three years, we've had nothing but cuts. It's huge when you consider we are one of the most underfunded universities in the country.

"We have excellent people here. We work as a team. We'll do our best."

Democratic presidential hopeful and former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean loads his own bags into the back seat of a campaign aide's car upon his arrival in Burlington, Vt., early Wednesday morning after he finished a disappointing third place in Tuesday's Wisconsin Presidential Primary. Dean, who has not yet won a presidential primary or caucus, will have an event Wednesday afternoon in his hometown of Burlington.

Dean packs his bags, ends campaign

By Ross Sneyd

BURLINGTON, Vt. – Howard Dean's quest for the presidency ended Wednesday as the Democrat, winless in 17 contests, bowed to political reality and abandoned his bid.

Once the little-known former governor of a small Northeast state, Dean took a summer ride to presidential campaign heights, attracting scores of followers and a Democratic record $41 million in campaign dollars, largely through the Internet.

Exactly one month ago, Dean was the candidate to beat – front-runner in national polls and poised to begin his primary romp with a win in the Iowa caucuses. It all crashed when the real votes were counted.

Dean finished a poor third in Iowa, second in New Hampshire and managed just single digits in several states through early February. One of his biggest union backers – the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees – bailed out on the day of the Washington and Michigan caucuses.

In the meantime, rival John Kerry cruised to 15 wins and seized the front-runner moniker. Dean dubbed Wisconsin a must-win, then a not really. After the votes were tallied Tuesday, the race had become what Dean had predicted – a two-man contest – but between Kerry and John Edwards.

Salina campus still needs candidates for elections

Only 6 students have filed for 21 Senate spaces

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The filing deadline for the Student Governing Association at K-State-Salina is at 4 p.m. Friday.

Nathan Gorrell, elections chair at K-State-Salina, said the elections are done similar to those of the Manhattan campus.

"We follow the same timeline, or at least try to," he said.

"There are a few minor differences, though."

Among the differences, Salina doesn't have a Union Governing Board, a Student Publications board, a Fine Arts Council or a College Council.

"We don't have all of the auxiliary councils. We went through the regulations code and made our own version," Gorrell said.

Of the 21 positions available in Salina for Student Senate, only six people have filed. Only one pair has filed for student body president and vice president.

"We really hope to have a successful election week. We are open to anyone who wants to file," Gorrell said.

Salina's SGA has meetings at 6 p.m. Tuesdays for interns.

Anyone interested in learning how to write legislation, learning the judicial processes or what the job descriptions are for cabinet members is invited.

"We haven't had a very established intern system in the past. We would like for that all to change," Gorrell said.

The main legislation that goes through Salina's Student Senate is comprised of club allocations. It makes up 80 percent of the legislation, Gorrell said.

Gorrell said Salina's SGA discussed Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' proposal that would raise tuition.

"We talked about it rather extensively. One role of our president is to keep us up to date on what Manhattan is doing," Gorrell said.

"We usually find out what Manhattan is doing and then jump on the bandwagon. We like to follow what Manhattan's doing."

Campus sculptures have diverse histories, intentions

By Stephanie Swoboda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Walking through campus, students are bound to notice the variety of sculptures.

Lynda Andrus, associate professor of art, said the sculptures on campus broaden the awareness of art to students and give them a chance to respond to it, whether in a good way or a bad way.

The K-State sculpture collection is diverse. Some sculptures were done by famous artists, while others were done by students or donated to the university.

"I love this piece — it has been a really wonderful addition to the outdoor sculptures on campus."

Location: Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art

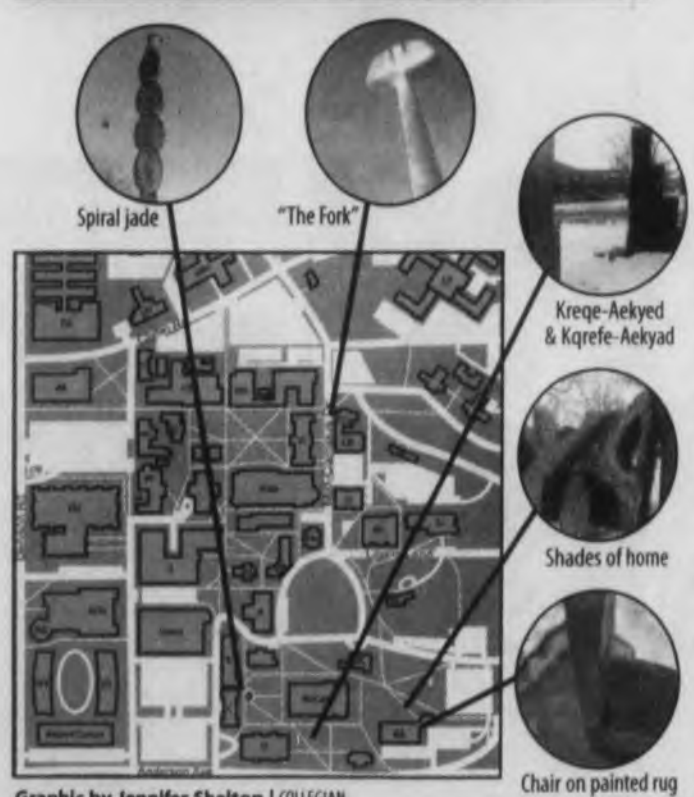
The story: When the museum received its first outdoor sculpture, officials hoped the visuals provided by the wooden chair and bronze rug would welcome people to visit the museum.

"For me, in a way it is kind of inviting people in, and we hoped that it would be," said Suzanne Hale, Beach Museum registrar and collections manager.

That was creator Wendell Castle's intent.

Castle wanted to play with individuals' sensibility when creating the sculpture, so he used materials generally perceived as uncomfortable and turned them into comforting perceptions, according to the museum's description.

SHADES OF HOME
Location: Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art



The story: For its second piece of art, the Beach Museum selected a sculpture created by world-famous artist Patrick Dougherty and K-State students.

"I love this piece – it has been a really wonderful addition to the outdoor sculptures on campus," Hale said. "It invites students to go in and see it because of the paths that they created going through it."

Dougherty used Siberian elm saplings to create the arches that sit between the art museum and All Faiths Chapel in November 2002.

The temporary sculptures created specifically for the K-State campus were built to last only 18 to 24 months, but museum officials said they don't intend on taking them down any time soon.

Taste test: Who has the best pizza?

	PIZZA SHUTTLE	GUMBY'S Pizza	PAPA JOHN'S
 Kevin Lowry FRESHMAN IN PRE-VETERINARY	"It's delicious. If I was going to order pizza, I would hope it would taste like this slice."	"It didn't have the flavor to overcome No. 1. It tasted kind of bland."	"It was average. I probably would not purchase this type of pizza unless it was a special."
 Natalie Anderson SOPHOMORE IN OPEN-OPTION	"Most flavorful. It was scrumptious."	"More bland, not very flavorful. I probably would buy it if it was the only place still open late at night, and I was drunk."	"It's good, but not a favorite."
 Evan Needham SOPHOMORE IN ARCHITECTURE	"Usually appealing crust is evenly baked adn without yellow mystery specks. Sauce has desirable tomato taste. Great cheese."	"Crust resembles pasty white flesh with cellulite. Taste of sauce is more of meat, not vegetable. Mystery yellow granuals on crust."	"A crispness to the crust; it's a good thing. uneven distribution of sauce. The cheese is a bit more salty than something I like."
 Cale Holdsworth FRESHMAN IN OPEN-OPTION	"Soft crust. Sweet sauce. Good ingredient proportions."	"Very herbal. Spicy sauce. Great cheese texture."	"Sweet sauce. A lot of pizza in one piece."
 Kelly Reinecke FRESHMAN IN NUTRITION	"Pretty greasy, and the crust was kind of hard. Sauce is a little spicy."	"Has too much sauce for me. Crust was hard."	"I think this one has a good even amount of cheese a sauce. Not very greasy, either."
 Corey Schneider SUPHOMORE IN ARCHITECTURE	"Best crust — soft but done. Most greasy. Good sauce-to-cheese ratio."	"Too many herbs. Best visual appeal. Not enough cheese. Crust was too dry."	Hard crust. Not enough sauce. A little overdone."
 Stacey Strathman FRESHMAN IN NUTRITION	"It's kind of greasy. Hard crust."	"It has a thicker crust. There is hardly any sauce on it."	"Has a good crust. Also a good amount of cheese and sauce."

This unscientific taste test was conducted in the Collegian newsroom Wednesday. Students were chosen at random. Pizza brands were not known during the test. Pizza topping was cheese, and all pizza was served hot.

Student leaders serve as ambassadors

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student body president and vice president are the two most powerful student positions at K-State.

The filing deadline for the 2004-05 Student Governing Association elections is 4 p.m. Friday at the Salina and Manhattan campuses.

STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT JOB DESCRIPTION

- In addition to the following jobs, Salina's president serves as a cabinet member to the Manhattan campus.
- They are in charge of the executive branch for SGA, which is set up like the national government.
- They are considered a representative of the student body at K-State.
- The president has veto power over Student Senate legislation.

The president can approve or veto anything not an internal issue.

- They serve on Faculty Senate as representatives of the students.
- The executive branch is in charge of appointments to university committees, such as the technology and parking committees.
- The K-State representative to the student advisory committee is a representative to the regents universities.

There they focus on statewide issues.

STUDENT BODY VICE PRESIDENT JOB DESCRIPTION

- They do committee appointments, usually assigned to them.
- They serve as chair to the Educational Opportunity Fund Committee, which meets every fall.
- They fill in for the president when he or she is unable to fulfill a section of the job description.

Buying homes alternative to renting

In depth

The Collegian takes a look at the process of buying or renting a house or an apartment in the Manhattan area.

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although buying a house seems like something to do after college, this might not always be the case.

Whether it be a mobile home or a house, students often find buying to be the better option during college.

"We have a lot of college students come in," said Marlene Irvine, associate broker with Century 21 Irvine Real Estate Inc.

Parents will usually buy the house, but students are the ones who approach them first, she said.

"The students come in, and we show them houses. They narrow it down to three or four houses, and the parents come and look at them," she said.

This happened for Trisha Hamblin, junior in animal science, when she first came to K-State.

She said it has helped with cost, but she still has to pay rent for her lot.

Hamblin pays around $250 a month, with water, cable and other bills included.

"In my opinion, it has been a little more expensive than it should be," she said.

Irvine said she has found students who buy a house save money. The reason for this is because houses in the area appreciate extremely well, she said.

"Students usually are able to sell back their house for more than they bought it," she said.

Irvine said the best time to start looking to buy is in March, but they are busy all year.

Certain houses seem to rotate between college students and military personnel.

Kari Smith, sophomore in psychology and social work, said she decided to rent a house, because it was the only option that would work.

"There are five of us going to live together, so we needed a house and not an apartment," she said.

She said she didn't really consider buying a house, because she didn't think it would work.

"I'm from out-of-state, so buying a house wasn't a very good option for me," she said.

When looking for a house to rent, she said she and her roommates visited quite a few houses before choosing – as soon as they came back to Manhattan from winter break.

This, she said, was one reason she and her roommates found exactly the house they were looking for.

"It was relatively close, had a washer and dryer and had five bedrooms," she said. "It was the perfect fit. It all just kinda fell into place."

Smith said whether students buy or rent, they must know what they want before shopping.

Renters discouraged by time-consuming process

By Lara Hastings
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

You've just received the perfect opportunity to study abroad or landed that out-of-state internship you've always wanted for the summer.

Now all you have to worry about is finding someone to sublease your apartment.

The hassles of subleasing can cause strain on those students with other summer obligations, but there are ways to make life easier by subleasing.

Jacquelyn Paetzold, senior in anthropology, said she has not started the process, but would like to find somebody to take her lease.

"First, I'll probably talk to people I know just to get the word out," Paetzold said.

If she does not hear from anybody interested in subleasing, she said she probably will place an ad in the newspaper.

Paetzold fears there will be a lot of advertisements requesting people to sublease and not very many people needing places to stay during the summer.

Other students such as Christie Hulsing, junior in elementary education, have had some luck with subleasing.

Hulsing and her other roommates hung signs around campus, which gave a brief description of the room available for sublease and provided a phone number. They also placed an ad in the newspaper.

Even though the women eventually found someone to sublease their extra room, Hulsing said it was still a difficult process.

It took two months after the room was first advertised to find someone to sublease, and not very many people responded to the ad.

Most apartment complexes offer similar policies regarding subleases.

In some cases, the original tenants must complete a sublease request or agreement form and pay a fee.

The amount of the fee varies with each complex.

E.G. Taylor, assistant manager at University Commons Apartments, said tenants at the complex pay a $50 sublease fee.

Other apartments, such as Chase Manhattan Apartments,charge a larger fee for those wishing to sublease their entire apartment, rather than just one room.

"Tenants are required to find their own people to sublease," said Tammy Mangold, leasing consultant at Chase Manhattan.

"They can also sublease for just one roommate or for the whole apartment."

Individuals who wish to sublease go through the same process as the original tenants.

They must pay an application fee and go through an application screening process.

If they are approved, they are added to the lease and pay a security deposit.

Once the person subleasing is added to the lease, the original tenant is no longer responsible for rent.

If tenants do not find somebody to take their lease for the summer, they are still responsible for paying rent for the months they do not live in the apartment.

Some apartments, though, no longer allow subleasing.

"One for us, and two for our tenants."

200 killed when train derails, catches fire in Iran Wednesday

By Ali Akbar Dareini
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEYSHABUR, Iran – Runaway train cars carrying a lethal mix of fuel and chemicals derailed, caught fire and exploded hours later Wednesday in northeast Iran, killing more than 200 people, injuring at least 400 and leaving dozens trapped beneath crumbled mud homes.

Reported dead were firefighters and rescue workers, who had extinguished the blaze outside Neyshabur, an ancient city of 170,000 people in a farming region 400 miles east of the capital, Tehran.

The dead also included top city officials – including Neyshabur's governor, mayor and fire chief as well as the head of the energy department and the director-general of the provincial railways – who all went to the site of the derailment, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

The explosion devastated five villages, where authorities rushed blood supplies and appealed through loudspeakers for donors.

Hardest hit was Hashemabad, where 41-year-old Zahra Rezaie, whose mud home was near the tracks, was cooking lunch for her family when she heard the explosion and felt the ground shake. Then the ceiling collapsed.

"It knocked down and broke some dishes. I was sure it was an earthquake, and my first thought was to rush to the school and save my children," Rezaie told The Associated Press. Her children were safe.

An AP photographer who arrived in Dehnow, one of the severely damaged villages close to the train tracks some 500 yards from the blast, said the village's homes were flattened.

"The houses are all built of clay, and nearly every one has been destroyed, like they had collapsed in an earthquake," Hassan Sarbakhshian said. "Everyone appears to have been evacuated," he said, adding he could see thick, black smoke billowing about 500 yards ahead.

Rescue workers, aided by cranes and giant floodlights, worked into the night, shrouded in toxic fumes as they searched for dozens of people thought to be trapped in their clay homes devastated by the blast.

The blast was so powerful that windows were shattered as far as six miles away.

In an apparent indication of the explosion's force, Iranian seismologists recorded a 3.6-magnitude tremor in the area, IRNA reported.

TO THE POINT

Dean should endorse another party candidate

When Democratic candidate Howard Dean announced the end to his campaign Wednesday after coming in third place in the Wisconsin primary, he failed to endorse another party candidate.

He told his supporters to continue voting for him even if he stops actively campaigning, and his name will remain on primary ballots.

It's obvious Dean has no chance at winning the nomination or beat President Bush in November.

The Democratic party, though, still has a chance.

By not endorsing front-runner John Kerry or John Edwards, Dean leaves his supporters guessing at which candidate is more closely aligned with their political beliefs.

Advising voters to continue checking Dean on their ballots is selfish and will only hurt the Democrats' chance at ousting Bush.

While he said he will eventually support the party's candidate, it's time Dean accepts defeat and changes his role within the party.

Pirates versus profiteers

Thieving entertainment harms industry in numerous venues

CHRISTOPHER HARROP

A lowly set designer, talking about how piracy in the entertainment industry hurts workers like himself, is met with indifference and mild bouts of laughter when his anti-piracy plea is shown on the big screen.

Laugh all you want, but it is true – piracy has the potential to cripple the entertainment industry and lower our standards as consumers of movies and music.

Film and music piracy occurs in many different ways. An insider sneaks an advance copy of a film or album out of the studio. Someone buys a pirated copy from a metropolitan street vendor. A regular college student launches his or her favorite file-sharing software and downloads a copyrighted work for free.

Whatever the case, piracy hurts the entertainment industry.

Industry groups say they lose between $3 and $4 billion annually due to piracy. While these figures are subject to debate, every dollar lost through piracy is a dollar that cannot be spent on the next great film or album.

Purchasing or downloading pirated material also shows there is a demand for pirated works. As long as there is a demand for illegal copies of copyrighted material, people will find ways to provide them to the public.

Say what you will about the Recording Industry Association of America's attempts to litigate file-sharing Netizens into the poor house. Attempts to stop the supply will continue to be fruitless as long as people keep downloading copyrighted materials.

When thousands of people download a feature-length film or full-length album before its release date, it speaks volumes to those who have access to copyrighted material.

Rampant downloading of copyrighted material also diminishes our entertainment standards.

Who wants to watch a film while sitting alone at their computer? The main allure of cinema is going to a theater, sitting in a darkened room with strangers and experiencing the images projected onto the screen.

Going to the theater is a social event, and our society continues to become reclusive through the private downloading of movies and music.

Some people are apt to blame the stars, musical talents and big-name directors and record producers for piracy's ill effects – that they are culpable for the set designer or sound engineer whose paycheck may never come.

This argument is nothing more than an excuse for piracy. While many everyday people lament the ludicrous salaries for entertainers and sky-rocketing movie ticket and album prices, they use this as justification for copyright infringement.

There is a fine line between boycotting the commercialization of Hollywood and stealing.

If someone really wants to send a message to the entertainment industry about disdain for low-quality productions, an organized boycott is the only logical answer.

Besides, no one should complain about the quality of films and music. Film and music critics are not in short supply, and finding out whether a work is a masterpiece or a dud before spending your hard-earned money is not a difficult task.

Besides, there are plenty of alternatives if you want digital music or movies on your desktop. iTunes and other online music services charge a mere 99 cents for a song. Online movie Web sites like www.CinemaNow.com charge about the same as your local rental store without the hassle of returning a VHS tape or DVD.

Your rights as a consumer allow you to choose what you purchase, but those rights do not decriminalize the act of illegally obtaining copyrighted materials.

LOGAN ADAMS

I'm not going to claim downloading tunes off Morpheus or swapping movies on KaZaA should be legal. It's a form of theft any way you look at it, and it should remain illegal.

But what really matters is how botched the attempts have been of certain groups to combat this trend and enforce the regulations against piracy.

The Recording Industry Association of America took the route of suing anyone it could, from elderly women who didn't own computers (identity-theft victims) to adolescents (who never understood what they were doing was actually stealing), so they could place them on a pedestal as examples to others of what comes the way of the pirate.

Some Christian music associations actually started ad campaigns emphasizing the sin involved in music piracy. Amazingly enough, it apparently had some effect.

The movie industry started running ads with Ben Affleck, Hollywood stuntmen and other pitiful-sounding characters claiming they lose money when people download their work instead of paying for it.

Oh, it hurts them so.

The first time I saw one of these ads was at a second-night showing of "Matrix Revolutions." The ad completely backfired.

The whole audience busted up into laughter, with several individuals speaking out in pride of their hordes of electronic booty.

People are just plain sick of lining the pockets of the fat cats of major recording companies by blowing cash on weak products that aren't deserving of the fruits of our labor.

We don't care about trying to save the little guys' salaries when we all know their sacrifices will just go to inflate the salaries of the big-shot producers, directors and actors (many of whom suck in the first place).

Artists – and I use that term loosely when it comes to people like Britney Spears, Christina Aguilera and whatever idiot stood up one day and said, "Let us do the Macarena!" – deserve to get paid for their work.

Actors who go through hell to prepare for their work, stuntmen who risk their lives for film, and writers who dream the stuff that moves us likewise deserve compensation.

But do they really need enough compensation to buy their own private islands?

Thus, I say these companies must make a choice:

One, they could remain in a state of denial, telling themselves they can win this war on piracy.

Or two, they can understand they won't win an all-out battle against the tech-savvy, and their only hope is to either work with the systems or work against the driving force behind them – the fan's dissatisfaction with their products.

C'mon, people, it's time to pull a Dr. Phil and get real here. The stuff you're making is no longer up to snuff.

The solution is to quit making crap not worth buying.

If you make stuff worthy of our money, we will buy it. You just need to provide what we want.

Also, it might help to follow the example of the Universal Music Group.

The group lowered prices – a smart move, and it will prosper from it.

We had to turn against the music and movie companies, because they were mistreating us.

They forgot it was our money filling their coffers, and we took them out to the shed.

Honor code extends to graduate students

Editor,

The Graduate School's Graduate Council voted unanimously in December to become part of the K-State Honor System.

On Feb. 10, and on Feb. 12, Faculty Senate and Student Senate, respectively, unanimously approved the Honor System Constitution and bylaws changes, which will include the Graduate School as part of the Honor System.

What was formerly the K-State Undergraduate Honor System will now be known as the K-State Honor System, and will apply to all academic work and courses in all undergraduate and graduate colleges, with the exception of courses taught in the College of Veterinary Medicine, which has its own professional ethical standards and adjudication process.

With the addition of the Graduate School, the existing principles of the Honor System have been maintained.

With the addition of the Graduate School, the existing principles of the Honor System have been maintained.

Ten graduate students will be appointed to the Honor Council by the Graduate Student Council president upon the recommendation of the Graduate Student Council and the approval of the provost.

Any case involving an alleged Honor Pledge violation by a graduate student will be adjudicated by graduate students and graduate faculty, all members of the Honor Council. The Hearing Panels will be made up of three graduate students and two graduate faculty members of the Honor Council. The chair will alternate between graduate students and graduate faculty.

K-State is one of three large public universities (along with the University of California at Davis and the University of Maryland at College Park) that has what is known as a modified Honor System, which means it has an Honor Pledge and a student majority on hearing panels (three students, two faculty).

A traditional Honor Code college or university would also include un-proctored exams and the requirement for students to report all Honor Pledge violations.

When our Honor System constitution and bylaws were being drafted, it was decided by the Honor Council that K-State would be a modified Honor System.

For more information about the K-State Honor System, please visit our Web site www.k-state.edu/honor.

Interpretation of Jesus as a political figure inaccurate

Editor,

This is in defense of Jesus, whose ministry was not at all political, and in response to Tuesday's "Clash."

1. Jesus would not support or oppose welfare programs. He requires his followers, not government, to take care of society's needs as stated in James 1:27. However, the Church abdicated this role after the Great Depression. 2 Corinthians 9:7 says, "God loves a cheerful giver," so it would be senseless to legislate charity into law. This totally misses Jesus' point that he wanted compassion to come from the heart, not out of legalistic obligation.

2. Karl Marx, who said, "Religion is the opiate of the masses," would spit on Jesus before applauding him. Jesus overturned the tables in the temple, not because he hated a nonexistent capitalism, but because it was sacrilege. The temple was to be a place of worship and not exploitative trade. Jesus said in Matthew 21:13, "'It is written,' he said to them, 'My house will be called a house of prayer, but you are making it a den of robbers.'"

3. As for Jesus having a stance on the war, again he wouldn't have one. He never politically opposed the injustices of Caesar. He disappointed many by not being the next King David, which caused them to turn against him. So Jesus would remind us to pray for God's justice, like in Luke 18:7-8, instead of being anti-Bush or pro-UN.

Students need to speak out against governor's budget

Editor,

I never thought I would say this to the Collegian, but thank you for your coverage of the governor's proposal.

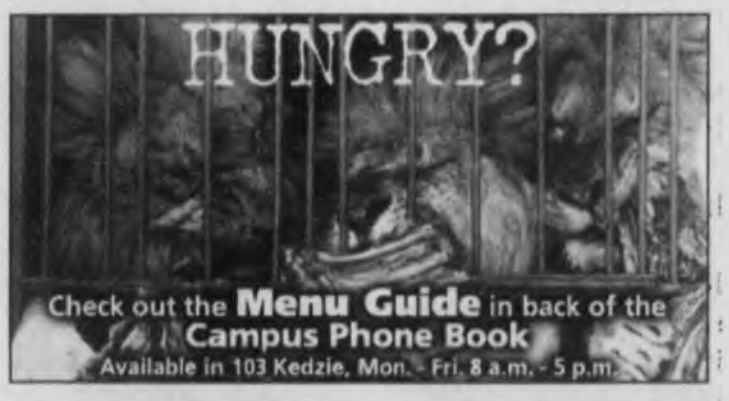
I went from shocked to furious as I read about how her promises actually work in reality. Do I understand this right? Will K-State students' tuition also go to things that we are already paying state taxes for instead of to our university that uses those increases for things it can already not afford?

I have no doubt that most of our professors and employees are underpaid. Yet, is this how our governor intends to fix this, by putting that money into roads?

This is truly an outrage, and I am ashamed I wasted my vote on her. This is the time for K-State students to say something.

Please, take the 10 minutes to write to the governor, our senator, our representatives and tell them that we will not stand for this.

We've already done nothing about this for the last four years, but I, for one, refuse to let my tuition money leave this university for general state funds. Please, everybody follow our student body president's lead (something I also thought I'd never get to say), and stand up and say something.



We can't let this happen.

K-State baseball team has potential for success

WES MARFIELD

It's the middle of February.

Basketball is still a good month from really picking up, and football season is waving goodbye in the rearview window.

To me, it's the most exciting part of the sporting year.

You see, in a mere month and a half, baseballs will be flying around faster than legal papers at NBA headquarters. And there is a lot for us to be excited about in the Heartland.

For the first time since Columbus sailed the ocean blue, the Kansas City Royals have actually spent their offseason trying to put together a contender.

But we really need to look no farther than our own backyard to get pumped for the pending season.

Led by first year skipper Brad Hill, the K-State baseball team returns only 14 letter-winners from a season ago.

They won only 15 games last season, a season with a stretch of 16 straight losses.

It was ugly. And to many, it was an all-too-familiar story played out by Royals teams for over a decade.

This is a different year, a different team, and there is a different feel surrounding this squad.

Optimism is brimming from Hill, as the coach brings with him a Division II championship, won last year at Central Missouri State University.

We believed in Tony Pena last season. He turned around a ballclub that posted 100 losses the year before, relying on guys with little or no major league experience.

This season, it's time to begin believing in Brad Hill.

He returns senior starter Brett Bagley and junior closer Eric Rollins, who should prove to be a successful one-two punch on the mound.

Also back are seniors Josh Heinrich behind the plate and utility man Zack Saunders.

Hill will look to those two, as well as Bagley, to lead the newcomers as team captains.

Most new coaches find themselves on the hot seat when they take over a new program.

But that isn't the way Hill thinks.

He wants his team to go out and learn the fundamentals before even beginning to look at their record. This is exactly why I became a believer.

I am as guilty as the next guy when it comes to attending K-State baseball games. Before last season, I spent 19 years living in Manhattan without ever watching a game at Frank Myers Field or the newly renovated Tointon Family Stadium.

Assigned to cover a home game against Wichita State University last May, I was completely captivated by the experience.

It was like the first time you realized your favorite childhood cereal had a toy buried in the bottom.

Seeing the passion in that man's eyes made me wish I had been around the program sooner.

When Hill was announced as the new coach this spring, I knew what I had to do.

I saw flashes of Tony Pena and I requested to be the beat writer for the baseball team this spring.

So here I am.

I'm not writing this saying the Cats will, without a doubt, find themselves in this year's College World Series.

But I'm not ruling it out.

Kauffman Stadium was the place to be last baseball season.

The magic will still hopefully be there this year, but look no farther than Tointon Family Stadium if you want to become a believer again this season.

Jeremiah Massey and Jarrett Hart celebrate during the final moments of the Wildcats' win over Nebraska Wednesday in Lincoln. The win broke a 21-game conference road losing streak.

K-State men win in final seconds at Nebraska

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In dramatic fashion, the men's basketball team snapped its 21-game conference road losing streak Wednesday, downing Nebraska, 63-58.

With less than a minute to go and the Wildcats (12-10, 4-7) down by one point, Nebraska's Nate Johnson hit a spinning layup in the lane to put the Cornhuskers (14-8, 4-7) ahead by three points, 58-55.

On the ensuing possession, senior guard Tim Ellis was fouled by Nebraska's Corey Simms, sending Ellis to the line with 50 seconds left to play in the game. Ellis hit both free throws, putting the Wildcats within one, 58-57.

The Cornhuskers got the ball back and, after running the clock down to 25 seconds, Brian Conklin missed a layup and K-State's junior forward Jeremiah Massey pulled in the rebound to give the Wildcats a shot at winning the game.

After a timeout, the Wildcats set up their offense and got the ball inside to Massey, who went for the shot, but was fouled by Nebraska's Andrew Drevo with 5 seconds left. Massey stepped up to the charity stripe with a chance to either tie the game or take the lead.

Massey missed his first free throw.

"Coach told us that it the ball comes off, we need to scrap and get it," senior guard Jarrett Hart said.

Massey stepped to the line again, and with the Nebraska faithful on its feet, missed the second free throw.

K-State's Tim Ellis shoots over Nebraska's Nate Johnson and John Turek during the Wildcats' win over the Huskers in Lincoln on Wednesday. The win moved K-State over Nebraska in the Big 12 standings.

As both the Wildcats and Cornhuskers battled for the rebound, K-State sophomore forward Marques Hayden got a hand on the ball and tipped it off the glass, right into the waiting hands of Ellis, who laid the ball in with 2.6 seconds left. The tip-in gave the Wildcats the lead, 59-58.

"It was a heck of a play," Wooldridge said.

The Cornhuskers tried a full-court pass, but the ball found no one and went out of bounds, giving the Wildcats the ball and the win.

"I wasn't happy until there were three zeros on the clock," Hart said.

Ellis said of his game-winning rebound and shot, he wanted to be in the right place.

"I just didn't want to give up and I wanted to put myself into position," Ellis said. "I was in the middle of the lane, and it came off, and I went for it."

Ellis led all scorers with 25 points, and Massey was the only other Wildcat in double figures with 17.

K-State shot 44 percent from the field, while holding Nebraska to 34 percent.

"This is a big win for our guys," Wooldridge said. "There was a lot of fight in our team tonight."

Both Ellis and Hart said they were excited to finally have the 21-game losing streak snapped.

"This is what we have been fighting for all season," Hart said. "I'm too excited for words."

"The monkey is off of our backs," Ellis said.

CFB | Cosh named K-State linebackers coach

Cosh

Cosh has spent the past five years coaching under Lou Holtz at the University of South Carolina. He was the defensive coordinator for the Gamecocks during the 2003 season.

MLB | Maddux returns to Chicago with 3-year deal

Maddux

Maddux and the Cubs agreed to a $24 million, three-year deal, a source close to the negotiations told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

The Cubs can void the final year based on certain criteria, including if Maddux doesn't pitch a certain amount of innings in 2005. Maddux needs to pass a physical to complete the deal, though the Cubs hoped he'd report to camp Wednesday in Mesa, Ariz.

The four-time Cy Young winner made his major league debut with the Cubs in 1986. Now 37, Maddux will join an impressive rotation including Kerry Wood, Mark Prior, Matt Clement and Carlos Zambrano, a group that nearly pitched the Cubs into the World Series last October.

Maddux was 16-11 with a 3.96 ERA last season for Atlanta. He's posted at least 15 wins for 16 straight years, and is only 11 victories shy of 300.

NBA | Celtics terminate Baker's contract

Baker

The Celtics released Baker on Wednesday after the forward cleared waivers following his suspension for violating the terms of his alcohol treatment program.

The move terminates Baker's contract, and may allow the team to avoid paying Baker the $36 million he is owed for the remaining 2 1/2 years on his contract. It also is likely to initiate a showdown between the team and the National Basketball Players' Association.

The union has said it would file a grievance over any attempt to void the contract. But Celtics attorney Neil Jacobs said Baker was not ready to play as his contract required, and the team had a right to release him.

NHL | Capitals trade Bondra to Washington Senators

Peter Bondra choked up twice while talking about his trade to the Ottawa Senators. Not even the prospect of playing for a Stanley Cup contender could ease the trauma of a sudden goodbye after 14 years with the Washington Capitals.

"I grew up here. I grew up as a player. I grew up as a person," Bondra said in an emotional farewell appearance Wednesday in the Capitals locker room. "I have to understand that I have to move on."

Dating can be difficult.

Especially when the two people dating are dysfunctional and their therapists are crazy.

Joe Clark, senior in theater, plays Bruce, a confused man who has left a personal ad in the paper. Enter Prudence, played by Sarah Bode, senior in theater and Spanish, a troubled woman looking for a man and answering the ad.

The play, "Beyond Therapy" by Christopher Durang, is a hysterical, absurd, romantic comedy, Vi Tran, graduate student in theater, said.

"The play is about a dysfunctional couple that meet on a blind date," Tran said. "It covers their strange courtship and their relationships with their even stranger therapists.

"So it's basically a romantic comedy about dysfunctional people that move through a world even more irrational than they are."

Tran is directing the play "Beyond Therapy" in Nichols Hall, something rare at K-State. Tran said he was fortunate enough to get the opportunity to direct, which is part of his master's thesis.

"It's been a great growing experience," Tran said. "I'm still trying to find my voice as a director and my style, and I've been trying to adapt to the different types of actors and people to work with.

"I've found out I don't have to do everything – in some of the student productions, they set you free over there. Here I have found out what my duties are and what I should leave to others, so I don't step on anyone's toes. It's been a great experience."

Bode said the absurdness of the play makes it hysterical and makes the play enjoyable. She said people can relate to it, even though it is such an off-the-wall play.

"Prudence is searching for love and searching for who she is, and she's going to therapy," Bode said. "She's slept with her therapist and has a crazy love life.

"You can relate to parts of the play. There are crazy things that happen that it's not too realistic, but there are realistic moments."

Dan Heinz, graduate student in theater, plays Stuart, Prudence's therapist. He said his character can be described easily.

"In the words of Prudence, Stuart is a premature ejaculator and a lousy therapist," Heinz said. "Not too many people will come out and not laugh.

"No matter the tastes of the audience, there's something for everyone. There are jokes that everyone should get and then deeper jokes that you have to look for on a different level."

Clark said the play is unique because Durang has an interesting writing style.

"Durang has this sort of bizarre humor," Clark said. "The way that he is able to write in this play, he has a sort of absurdity that people can still relate to. It may seem outlandish, but he is able to tie everything together in the end."

Heinz said it is a nice change to be in a comedy. He said it's easier and more rewarding to hear the audience's response.

"I've done some serious plays in my time, and you don't always know how well you've done from night to night," Heinz said. "But in a comedy you need people to laugh, otherwise you're not doing your job. It's easier to flip into a serious mode, but it can be hard to be funny."

Tran said he chose the play because it is a topical play and it has many similarities in life.

He said people should enjoy the play but be cautious, because it is a play for mature audiences.

"I think it fits because we're in a quick-fix world," Tran said. "Everyone thinks that 10 minutes of Dr. Phil can alleviate our problems, and everyone is celebrating reality shows.

"So it has a nice parallel to the '80s, when this play was written, back when pop culture ruled and the surface seemed to be everything."

Heinz said people should see the play because it's a fresh change from everyday life.

"Anyone who finds themselves sitting at home watching the 'Real World' or 'Survivor,' or any of that business, you should come out and watch this show. I promise you'll laugh harder than at that stuff," Heinz said.

CELEB NEWS

Novoselic drops politics

Krist Novoselic, one of the founding members of the grunge rock band Nirvana, said he's dumped plans to run for lieutenant governor of the state of Washington.

Novoselic

The musician originally planned to run against incumbent Brad Owen, a Democrat, but nixed the idea, saying, "I found out firsthand that it's really considered bad form to run against an incumbent of your own party."

Novoselic became heavily involved in politics after Nirvana disbanded in 1994 following the suicide of frontman Kurt Cobain.

He founded a political action committee and has written several editorials.

Now, Novoselic said, he is focused on endorsing John Kerry in the presidential race.

LeBlanc becomes a dad

"Friends" actor Matt LeBlanc and his wife, Melissa, became parents last Sunday to daughter Marina LeBlanc, who weighed in at 7 pounds, 1 ounce, and measured 19 inches long.

LeBlanc

The child is the first for LeBlanc and the third for Melissa, who has two children from a previous marriage. The couple wed May 3, 2003, in Hawaii. They had been dating for five years.

LeBlanc's connection with "Friends," meanwhile, is far from over. The actor will star in a spinoff based on his character, Joey Tribbiani.

In the series, set to air this fall, Joey finally sets out to pursue his dream of being an actor.

Jackson trial to start soon

The judge in pop star Michael Jackson's child molestation case said he wants a trial to be underway by the end of the year.

Jackson

Superior Court Judge Rodney Melville said at a hearing Friday that he wanted the trial to begin before 2004 is out; lawyers on both sides said they would be ready to go by December.

The proceeding, which Jackson did not attend, was more calm than his arraignment hearing last month. At the hearing, Jackson danced on top of an SUV in front of thousands of fans who turned out to support him.

At Friday's hearing, few fans were in attendance, and they were told to conceal words of support for Jackson printed on their shirts.

Eminem's ex-wife jailed

A Michigan judge sentenced Kim Mathers, ex-wife of rapper Eminem, to 30 days in prison after she tested positive for cocaine, a probation violation.

Mathers, 29, also received 90 days in court-mandated rehab, because she didn't uphold her end of the plea deal set between her attorneys and prosecutors last month.

The cocaine incident occurred last June, when Mathers was pulled over by police, who found several grams of cocaine in her Cadillac Escalade.

Kim Mathers and her famous, controversial husband, whose real name is Marshall Mathers, divorced in March 2001. They are the parents of seven-year-old Hallie Jade. Kim Mathers has another child from a previous relationship.

Music therapy slowly gaining mainstream acceptance

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hope for health

This is the first in a series of five stories examining unconventional forms of therapy.

Music therapy is not just a fad.

In fact, it already has established itself and is growing to include several areas.

John Richard, a music teacher at Bergman Elementary, incorporates music therapy in his lessons with severely disabled students.

"It's really just a matter of looking at what needs to be done and doing it," Richard said.

The district offers other therapy programs – including horticulture, drama and aquatic therapy – but budget restrictions do not allow music therapy in the district, a USD 383 spokeswoman said.

Use of music therapy in education, especially special education, has been expanding since the 1950s, said Al Bumanis, communications director for the American Music Therapy Association, an accreditation organization representing more than 5,000 music therapists.

This expansion is evidenced in part by an increase in the number of students enrolled in music therapy degree programs.

At the University of Kansas, one of the leading music therapy degree programs in the country, the number of students in the program has decreased slightly, from 105 in 1999 to 76 in 2003.

But the usefulness and wider acceptance of music therapy is the real indicator of the practice's popularity, Bumanis said.

Dena Register, professor of music therapy at KU, said music therapy is simply the use of music to achieve non-musical goals.

The general public often views music therapy as a trend, she said, but most don't realize the strong scientific basis.

"Because the publicity has increased in the past few years, people assume it's new," she said.

"It's getting more press now because there's more research being done."

According to the American Music Therapy Association, research exploring the benefits of music therapy is being published in multiple medical journals, with topics ranging from hospice care to early childhood development.

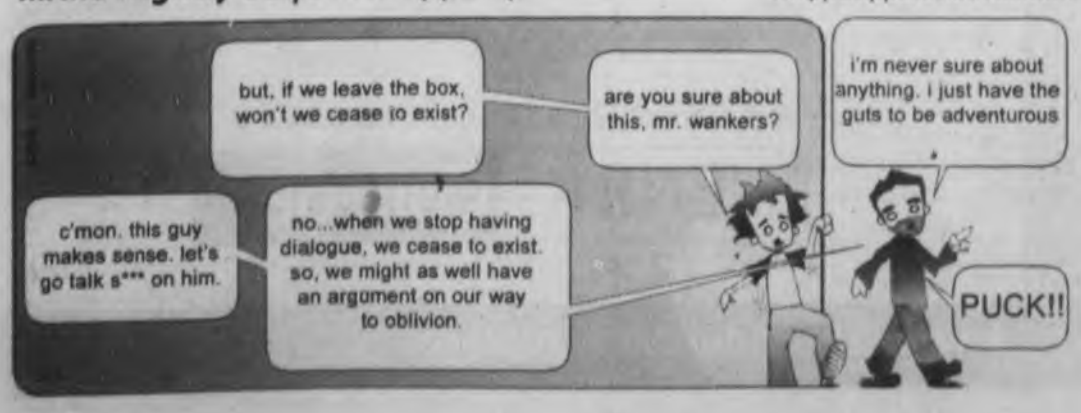
Music therapy has its roots in treating World War II veterans with mental and physical trauma. The earliest research was done when musicians would play at veterans' hospitals to soothe patients. It since has expanded to include all age groups and serves various functions.

Mental health often is the primary focus of music therapy, Bumanis said, but treatments can range from helping an elderly person recover from a stroke to teaching children how to read.

"Music therapy generally can be applied to most people," he said, "but as with any health profession, you must assess the client first."

Determining what treatment will be effective for a patient is the first – and most important – step in musical therapy, Bumanis said.

In the instance of an elderly person recovering from a stroke, Bumanis said, music might be played while he or she is learning to walk, and the tempo of the music would be increased gradually as the patient's walking improved.



For a child learning to read, the music therapy could be as simple as singing the ABCs to learn the alphabet.

What type of music is best for a client, Register said, depends on the purpose of the treatment and on the patient's preferences.

For much of her study with hospice care, the patients will choose what kind of music they want to work with – generally religious hymns or big-band music.

Although using music therapy for children with special needs was not one of the original intents, Bumanis said it is one of the most rapidly growing fields within music therapy.

Cox Bros. brings jazz series to town

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Combining barbecue with jazz and blues music, Cox Bros. BBQ started a series in October 2002 that has brought musicians from across the country to Manhattan.

"We felt a real need for jazz and blues in Manhattan," Cox Bros. co-owner Bud Cox said. "There is a lot of younger music in town, but this is classic."

Originally from Manhattan, Bailey had been living in Chicago and coming to Manhattan each summer to perform at Arts in the Park with other performances scheduled around it. While in town during summer 2002, Bailey was booked by Cox Bros. to perform at the restaurant.

"We're trying to bring in really strong acts, and we've been successful so far," Bailey said.

Greg Carroll, vibraphone player and director of education for the Manhattan-based International Association for Jazz Education, books the jazz acts.

He said he met the Cox brothers at Coco Bolos five and a half years ago when he came to town. The restaurant later hosted a CD-release party for Carroll's band.

He said that over time he continually asked the brothers for a jazz venue, and the jazz and blues series is an offshoot.

"The series allows people to expand their musical palate beyond what is normally seen in the Manhattan music scene, which is usually rock 'n' roll and country music," Carroll said.

Cox said the bands play to near capacity crowds of about 100 every time, and in the spring and summer when the patio is open, the audience increases to about 150.

Cox Bros. BBQ also has a food special, usually Cajun food, to go with the series.

At 7 tonight, Big Al & the Heavyweights will perform a show for a $3 cover charge. Cox said the band plays funky Cajun blues and is originally from south Louisiana, but is based out of Nashville.

If you go
Big Al & the Heavyweights
What: Big Al & the Heavyweights performance
When: 7 tonight
Where: Cox Bros. BBQ, 600 S. Fourth St.
How much: $3 cover charge

The group has released four albums.

"They're a real strong, hard-working band," Bailey said. "And they play authentic Cajun blues, none of this wannabe stuff."

Accompanying Big Al & the Heavyweights on the menu will be a three-course Cajun dinner featuring Louisiana seafood gumbo, Cajun pork roast dinner and New Orleans bread pudding for dessert.

"The brothers are all about certain elements of life, like food and music," Bailey said. "They do an incredible job on food and feel the same way about music."

Bailey will perform a show with no cover charge next Tuesday, which happens to be Fat Tuesday.

Bailey described the blues as a family business, so the word that Cox Bros. BBQ is a quality place to play traveled fast.

His problem is not that he has trouble finding great blues talent, but finding room on the schedule for everyone to play.

"They're providing musicians with food and a great place to play," Bailey said. "It's a smokehouse full of love."

The local blues element is also included. Bailey said the restaurant will begin to feature Kelley Gaunt, junior in hotel and restaurant management, on Sunday nights.

"She's a great singer," Bailey said. "Every time she performs, the place has been full, and people have been mesmerized by her."

Conference on Black Student Government focuses on empowering minority students

Annual event to include gospel concert, step show

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Empowerment: Learning From Our Past to Conquer Our Future" will be a phrase repeated often this weekend at K-State.

It's the theme of the Big 12 Conference on Black Student Government, which will take place today through Saturday, with students from all over the country.

This year's conference is hosted by K-State for the third time, with preparations beginning more than two years ago, said Myra Gordon, associate provost for diversity and dual career development.

The conference will have events open to the public, including a gospel extravaganza featuring Trinitee 5:7 and a step show, which will coincide with the theme, Morgan Fisher, co-chair of the conference, said.

The theme will focus on the struggles and challenges of the past, but also on the rewards of being black.

"We don't want students to dwell on the past, but to recognize it and feel uplifted and empowered by it and take it back with them to their respective campuses," Fisher said.

It's especially important for blacks to attend the conference because they are students at predominantly white schools, and it will give them a chance to be the majority – if only for a few days, Brandon Clark, co-chair of the conference, said.

"We rarely get the opportunity to be in a learning environment where we are able to come together and talk about the challenges we face," he said.

Black students are out of their comfort zones on their campuses, and they can get discouraged and want to give up, Clark said.

"We want students to come and meet people who look like them and have had similar experiences, even if it's just for a weekend, because they don't often get to experience that," he said.

The conference is not just for black students and minorities, Clark said.

A few white students will be attending the conference events. Clark said white students will learn what it is like to be the minority, but will also have a good time and benefit from their experiences.

The conference is also geared toward campus leaders.

"Student leaders will come together and attend workshops on racial issues, political issues and how to become successful on a predominantly white campus," Fisher said.

Keynote speakers will be giving speeches focusing on leadership and relationship development, political awareness and career preparation, as well as other topics, to the 1,000 students who will be in attendance, Gordon said.

"Students will leave our campus empowered and prepared for leadership roles both on their campuses and their respective communities," she said. "It is a great privilege to continue the legacy of this conference."

The conference began 27 years ago when black students realized they were all facing similar challenges on predominantly white campuses, Gordon said.

"The students came together to think through strategies for success and survival on campuses that were not ready for black student presence at the time," she said.

Bush voices dismay over gay marriages in California

By Scott Lindlaw
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – President Bush said Wednesday he was troubled by gay weddings in San Francisco and by legal decisions in Massachusetts that could clear the way for same-sex marriage.

He declined to say whether he was more inclined now to back a constitutional ban. However, he spoke privately with conservative Catholics about the issue, and a conservative activist who favors such a ban suggested the president would soon announce his support.

"I have watched carefully what's happening in San Francisco, where licenses were being issued, even though the law states otherwise," Bush said at the White House.

"I have consistently stated that I'll support law to protect marriage between a man and a woman.

"Obviously these events are influencing my decision," he said.

Bush didn't answer directly when asked whether he was any closer to endorsing a constitutional ban on same-sex marriages, as conservative groups say the White House has privately promised.

"I'm watching very carefully. But I'm troubled by what I've seen," Bush said.

"People need to be involved with this decision. Marriage ought to be defined by the people, not by the courts."

One group took issue with Bush's insistence that "people," not the courts, need to resolve the issue.

"In San Francisco, the democratically-elected mayor took this action just weeks after hundreds of thousands of people voted for him," said Jon Davidson, senior counsel of Lambda Legal, a gay and lesbian legal group.

"It's the right-wing groups that have taken this into courts seeking to define marriage in a way that would exclude same-sex couples, in violation of California's Constitution," Davidson said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Bush recognized gay marriage as a divisive topic.

But, he said, "this is an issue where he believes it is important for people to stand up on principle."

"We may eventually have to take it down when it becomes something that the artist had not intended it to be," Hale said.

Katherine Walker, employee at the art museum, said Dougherty originally wanted to create a piece of art in treetops, but after considering the cost of cranes and fork lifts, decided to keep his creation on the ground.

Dougherty said his sculptures reflect the surrounding area and environment of the sculpture.

ART IN SITUATION WORKSHOP SCULPTURES

This workshop was taught by Rex Replogle, who was an associate professor of art, and John Vought, associate professor emeritus of art.

The eight-week workshop focused on areas of campus needing upgrades, Vought told the Collegian in 1989.

As a result, many of the sculptures on campus were created in that workshop in 1969, including the untitled pieces described below.

UNTITLED I

Location: King Hall

One piece created in the summer workshop included "Untitled" by James Wentz, better known as "The Fork."

Wentz's sculpture is the tallest outside on campus, with its prongs 20 feet in the air.

The name, Wentz said in a previous Collegian article, was left up to its audience.

"I probably had an idea in mind when I designed it, but I left it untitled," he said. "I let people decide for themselves what it is."

"I wonder why we have a giant fork in the middle of the grass."

UNTITLED II

Location: Between K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall

The story: Another untitled sculpture was created in the summer workshop by Robert Hudson.

Hudson used concrete and poured it into styrofoam and wooden supports. Once the concrete dried, Hudson removed the supports.

Even though the sculpture was created decades ago, Avel Pinales, freshman in mechanical engineering, said it reminds him of something from ancient ruins.

"Maybe it is a bird's eye view of a village," he said.

SPIRAL JADE

Location: Kedzie Hall

The story: While some of the pieces of artwork were created by students or donated by artists, others were purchased by the university.

One such piece sits outside Kedzie Hall after it was purchased in 1976.

For the piece, Luppers used an industrial clip-hammer to shape the train axle into the twisted shape students pass daily.

"It's rusty, not too eye catching, and it looks like it has been here awhile," Brad Hajek, senior in computer science, said.

KREQE-AEKYED AND KQREFE-AEKYAD

Location: Between Thompson and Nichols Halls

The story: The meanings behind the names for these minimalist pieces are a mystery, and so is the pronunciation.

The first sculpture cost the university $5,000, while the second one, Kqrefe-Aekyad, was a gift to the university from the Reid Foundation to complement the brother piece.

"I just see that they give an element of culture to the campus," Burghart said.

A day after his distant third-place finish in Wisconsin, Dean announced he would no longer actively pursue the presidency, but "we will, however, continue to build a new organization using our enormous grassroots network to continue the effort to transform the Democratic Party and to change our country."

Striking the defiant tone that has been the hallmark of his candidacy, the former Vermont governor urged his delegates of some 200 to stick with him.

"Keep active in the primary," Dean declared to an overflow crowd of more than 500 flag-waving supporters and staff. "Sending delegates to the convention only continues to energize our party. Fight on in the caucuses. We are on the ballots. Use your network to send progressive delegates to the convention in Boston."

Historians will have the final say, but Dean was the candidate who rose from obscurity to a main draw on the www.Meetup.com Web site, newsmagazine cover boy and unrivaled grass-roots organizer. It never paid off in Iowa, and all that was remembered was a high-octane concession speech that will live on long after Dean's candidacy.

His address Wednesday was quieter but not much more reflective. It was a call to build an enduring political movement to elect like-minded Democrats to Congress and local offices and unite to defeat President Bush in the fall.

Although he encouraged supporters to continue voting for him, he did make clear he would not seek to derail the party's ultimate nominee.

"I will not run as an independent or third-party candidate," he said, as his wife Judy stood behind him.

A physician whose rare appearance on the campaign trail had been the subject of discussion of whether she was a proper political wife, Dean drew cheers when he saluted her for starting the debate in the country "about whether a woman needs to gaze adoringly at her husband or follow her own career."

Dean did not endorse any of his rivals, although he called Edwards and Kerry to discuss his departure from the race. Both had kind words for the former candidate, with Edwards saying Dean "has energized and revolutionized this race, and excited a whole new generation of young people."

Kerry told reporters in Ohio that "it's impossible not to express admiration and respect for the campaign that he's put together and what he's achieved."

Dean has been impressed with Edwards and suggested on the campaign trail that he would make a better nominee, but Dean has decided to stay out of the Kerry-Edwards contest, a Dean aide said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Despite his departure, Dean made it clear he will keep a close eye on the remaining candidates.

"I will support the nominee of our party," Dean said.

"I will do everything I can to beat George W. Bush. I urge you to do the same. But we will not be above in this organization of letting our nominee know that we expect them to adhere to the standards that this organization has set for decency, honest, integrity and standing up for ordinary American working people."

Women escape with 3-point win over A&M

Wildcats now tied with Texas for 1st place in Big 12 conference race

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Numbers can be deceiving sometimes.

This three-point win against Texas A&M (8-16, 1-12) in Reed Arena was supposed to be, on paper, a cakewalk.

But in both the men's and women's games in the Big 12 this year, contests played on the road have been anything but that.

The Aggies were the last-place team in the conference.

This was the 299th worst rebounding team in the country of the 324 that play Division I women's basketball.

They were taking on No. 8 K-State (20-3, 11-1), the best-shooting team in the Big 12, which also had the best field-goal percentage defense.

A win is a win, but Wednesday's win for the K-State women's basketball team in College Station, Texas, had a little bit more meaning.

The victory now puts the Cats in a two-way tie for first place in the Big 12 with the University of Texas.

In Aggie coach Gary Blair's weekly message to fans, he spoke of how "the Nicole Ohlde, Kendra Wecker and Laurie Koehn show" stopped his Arkansas team's run in the NCAA tournament a few years ago.

Wednesday's show starred Wecker, who scored the first 11 points of the game, finishing with 17 on the night.

This happened even though the Cats had not practiced since Saturday's Nebraska game and had been putting up with migraine headaches all week.

K-State's first basket not shot by Wecker was junior guard Megan Mahoney's 3-pointer with 8 minutes left in the first half.

She finished with five points, nine rebounds and three assists.

Laurie Koehn led all scorers with 22 points which included 5-of-9 3-point shooting.

They came within two points of toppling No. 1-ranked Texas and were up three points with 19 seconds left, before losing to No. 9 Texas Tech by one.

At one point late in the first half, A&M was up by 13 points and went into the locker rooms up 32-22.

K-State started the second half on a 16-2 run and finally took the lead back, 36-34, with 13:02 left in the game and never looked back.

Iraqi elections must be conducted by June 30

By Lee Keath
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq– The top U.S. administrator in Iraq insisted Thursday there are many ways to choose a new Iraqi government, but a June 30 deadline for handing over power remains firm. Hours later, the United Nations backed Washington's claims that a direct vote before then is impossible.

The U.N. judgment on elections throws open the debate over how to transfer sovereignty and end the U.S. occupation – though not the U.S. military presence – among Americans, Iraq's Governing Council and powerful Shiite Muslim clerics, who derailed U.S. plans by demanding an early direct vote.

Iraqi leaders have largely turned against the original American plan to use regional caucuses as the basis for the new government. The Bush administration hopes that U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan will now endorse an alternative that would expand the Governing Council and hand it power to rule until elections, a U.S. official told the Associated Press.

Support is growing within the United States-appointed council for expanding the body, several members said Thursday.

The council is also due to finish drafting an interim constitution next week, resolving the key questions of federalism and the role of Islam in the government. While calling for any charter to acknowledge the Islamic nature of Iraq, U.S. administrator L. Paul Bremer said the law must be based on secular democratic principles.

In New York, Annan did not give any recommendations on how to pick a provisional government. He has reportedly said he won't weigh in on that issue before Feb. 25.

But after his special envoy, Lakhdar Brahimi, briefed representatives of 45 nations and the European Union on his weeklong visit to Iraq, Annan told reporters an early vote was not feasible.

"We shared with them our sense – and the emerging consensus or understanding – that elections cannot be held before the end of June, that the June 30 date for the handover of sovereignty must be respected and that we

Food Court cutting hours of operation

By Oksana Boyko
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Having a bite before a night class at the Union Food Court will no longer be an option. The Union Food Court is cutting back its hours of operation in an attempt to help revenues meet expenses.

Starting Monday, the Food Court will be open 7 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Saturday.

Gayle Thober, director of union dining services, said the main reason behind cutting hours is emptiness of the Food Court in the late afternoon and, as a result, a dramatic decrease in sales.

"By 5:30, there is no one there. Our sales drop off so much, and it takes a lot of employees to keep it open," Thober said.

Thober said keeping the Food Court operating after 5:30 p.m. costs about $1,700 per hour, whereas late-afternoon hourly sales fluctuate around $330.

Christine Baker, senior in political science and member of the Union Governing Board, said the board approved cutting back on hours two weeks ago. It was UGB that recommended

Players support Colorado coach

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOULDER, Colo. – A half-dozen former Colorado football players defended their suspended coach Thursday, saying Gary Barnett has provided discipline and morality despite accusations that recruits were lured with sex and alcohol.

Current players, meanwhile, said they hoped the current scandal would bring the team closer together as they prepare for spring practice – without Barnett.

"He plays a big part in organizing everything," tight end Quinn Sypniewski said. "But the other coaches are able to pick up when he's not around."

Barnett was placed on paid leave Wednesday night for criticizing the ability of former player Katie Hnida after she said she had been raped by a teammate in 2000. He said she was "not only a girl, she was terrible," a comment university officials said was unacceptable given the seriousness of her allegation.

Walk into Stray Cat Tattoo and there will be no doubt you're in the domain of an artist who knows what he digs and why he digs it.

Tattoo artist Robert Miller sets his drone to jams like Metallica's "Kill 'Em All," piped in from the break room where Miller and his band pound out hardcore punk when they're not piercing and tattooing the neighborhood.

The art strikes you from the pages of his well-worn portfolios. Every piece is carefully shaded and astonishingly realistic, much of which comes straight from the artist's imagination. He is inspired by horror movies and finds his vibe in death metal and hardcore punk.

"I'm into more of a macabre style," he said.

Miller has been an artist at Stray Cat for three and a half years and has been a tattoo artist for 14 years. These days he spends much of his time every day drawing and tattooing, perfecting his craft.

People can bring in a photo of just about anything, and Miller will transfer it to their skin with his needles and inks.

HOW TO

Stay on a teacher's good side

By Kerry Fischer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College students interact with their teachers constantly. It is important to stay on their good side. These tips will send you on your way to a blissful relationship with any teacher.

REGULAR ATTENDANCE

It's important that you attend class every day. If the teacher sees you are making an effort to learn something, even if you'd rather be getting a barium enema than sitting through 50 minutes of advanced mathematical reasoning, you're going to earn brownie points.

ACTIVE PARTICIPATION

In addition to regular attendance, active participation is key to a good teacher-student relationship as well. Ask questions and start a debate in your English class. Teachers know you are absorbing their information when you participate in class. It shows you actually care about what you're learning.

COMPLETING HOMEWORK

You'll never get anywhere in a class if you don't do the grunt work. Contrary to popular belief, teachers do not necessarily enjoy giving you busy work.

It means they have to grade it, and that's not fun for them.

Homework assignments are there to enrich your mind.

The sooner you turn in an assignment, the sooner the teacher can grade it, and you can get it back with a good grade.

Inclement weather disrupts day-to-day custodial operations

Sidewalks, classroom floors keep facility staff busy

By Lacey Storer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most of us have experienced it – setting down your bookbag in a classroom only to find it sitting in a pool of slush tracked in from the snowy sidewalks.

The winter weather can cause numerous problems on campus, one being the increase in messy floors. This has proved to be a headache for both students and custodians.

John Woods, director of the Division of Facilities, said having to deal with the snow can set back custodians work.

"If it's a major storm, it takes them half a day to get the sidewalks cleared," Woods said. "This means the custodians aren't able to get to the classrooms until later in the day."

Classrooms usually are cleaned at the beginning of each day. When it snows, clearing the snow from sidewalks and building entrances takes precedence over the classrooms.

Once the snow is cleared, custodians go back through to clean hallways and open classrooms.

Some classrooms, however, don't get cleaned a second time, because they are occupied all day.

"If they can, they go back to some of the major halls," Woods said. "But in most cases, the major classrooms are scheduled all day long, and they can't go back in."

Mike Stoddard, custodial supervisor for the Seaton complex, said it sometimes takes so long for his staff to get the snow cleared that workers don't have time for the classrooms.

"We try to do it every day, but sometimes it's impossible because of that," Stoddard said. "We just don't have the time because we're out there shoveling snow."

No additional workers have been called help clear the snow. While some custodians have put in overtime to clear all the snow, most have not had to.

Connaughton said the custodians use snow blowers on the outside walks and a floor machine inside.

They usually run the floor machine once per shift during good weather, but during snowy weather they run it 2-3 times per shift.

Woods said that students could do their part to help the custodians catch up on their work faster.

"What they usually do on the inside, they have to go outside and come in and catch up," said Woods.

Student Senate opts for 2-day fall break

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate opted for a two-day fall break and for classes to start on a Friday for the 2004-05 school year.

The vote on calendar issues was 30-21-0.

Student Body President John O'Hara said the choice was given for either a one-day fall break and starting school on Monday or the decision approved Thursday.

The decision came after Senate discovered the Board of Regents requires only 75 school days, and K-State was going 76.

"We are trying to look out for future students. This is a matter of the people who have been elected to decide for their constituents whether we have a one- or two-day fall break," O'Hara said.

Sam Meier, Faculty Senate representative, said he didn't like the idea of starting school on a Friday.

"The calendar reflects better upon starting on a Monday due to the internships and jobs students may be returning from over the summer," Meier said.

The possibility of Faculty Senate giving professors the option of dropping students after the first day of classes was also taken into account.

Eleri Griffin, allocations committee chair, said she didn't believe students would skip the first Friday of classes if they were aware of the new proposal.

"Students will get to see what can happen if they don't go to class on the first day," Griffin said.

The issue still has to pass through Faculty Senate before Student Senate reviews it.

Student Senate considered a bill allocating 50 percent of graduate students' privilege fees to be placed in a fund for their own expenses.

The bill will be considered again by the Allocations Committee.

Griffin said the committee considered giving graduate students 100 percent of the student privilege fees, but was changed to 50 percent.

"We reconsidered this recommendation after we looked at all of the activities that both graduate and undergraduate students can take part in," Griffin said.

If the bill passes, Griffin said it should generate as much as $3,000 more this year for the graduate-student account.

"This will be a checked system. There will be audits when deemed necessary. It is not going to be here's some money, run with it," Griffin said.

Senators discussed steps they would like to take with Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' plan to possibly raise K-State's tuition rates higher than expected.

O'Hara said the Student Advisory Committee passed a resolution at Wednesday and Thursdays' Kansas Board of Regents meetings that will be sent to all legislators.

"I think we can make a difference," O'Hara said. "We will write letters to the editor, I encourage you all to do the same. We will set up booths in the Union and, of course, talk with legislators at State Education Day."

Senator demands beef export decision

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Brownback
KANSAS SENATOR

TOPEKA – Republican Sen. Sam Brownback said Thursday he is pressing Japanese agricultural officials for a decision on when they will reopen their nation's markets to American beef.

Those markets closed after the U.S. Department of Agriculture confirmed the first-ever case of mad cow disease in an animal in Washington state in December. Since then, USDA officials have taken steps designed to make the beef supply safer, and state and federal officials have sought to reassure consumers that no health threat exists.

"It's a dance," Brownback said. "You've got to answer all the scientific, technical questions, but then sometimes, that's not enough. You have to then address the public perception issues, and you've got political concerns on both sides."

On Thursday, Brownback toured ranches in Riley and Pottawatomie counties with Japanese officials, and their itinerary included a visit to a processing plant operated by Tyson Fresh Meats Inc. in Emporia.

The senator and Takao Shibata, the Japanese consul general in Kansas City, Mo., also spoke to a luncheon attended by about 100 members of the Kansas Livestock Association.

Asked later when the Japanese government might decide to resume American beef imports, Shibata said.

"My hope is that it will be resolved as quickly as possible."

TO THE POINT

Troops leaving Iraq by June 30 will benefit all

Now that U.S. troops are in Iraq, they have a responsibility to ensure the country can survive on its own before evacuating.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan affirmed the United States' position that Iraqi elections should not be administered until the summer despite Iraqis demands for an early direct election.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While we disagree with the United States' presence in Iraq in the first place, it would be irresponsible and self-defeating to end the mission incomplete.

Iraq deserves to be independent from U.S. control, but not until citizens can be assured they will be safe from insurgency and the threat of another dictator coming into power.

However, the June 30 deadline for the transfer of power into Iraqi officials' hands must be final.

The U.S. army needs to do all it can to prepare and train Iraqi police and government officials for sovereignty before the deadline.

There can be no extensions. Because of religious and political conflicts, there probably always will be violence in Iraq, but the United States can't afford any more money or lives.

Leaving Iraq in a responsible, yet timely, manner will ensure we will leave both countries fulfilled.

Liberal news media rarely seen in political coverage

MICKAYLA FINK

Few American notions concerning truth confuse me as much as the mythical idea of the "liberal news media." This propaganda has been spreading throughout this nation for years, and it's time it stopped.

First, let's work from the assumption that a liberal news media would be one that projects a positive image about the Democratic candidate, while simultaneously casting the Republican in a negative light.

Using these criteria, one would assume that the media cast a much more favorable impression of Al Gore than George W. Bush in the 2000 election, right?

Unfortunately for Gore, this was not the case.

A study done by the Pew Charitable Trusts Project for Excellence in Journalism showed that 24 percent of the stories represented Bush positively, whereas only 13 percent did so for Gore.

The same study also revealed 56 percent of the stories focusing on Gore were negative, while only 49 percent of Bush's were negative.

Results such as these do not seem to show any liberal bias in the media coverage. They show quite the opposite, really.

The prevalence of conservative spin in media coverage is amazing.

So where did this conservative propaganda about a liberal news media come from?

I honestly don't know where it started, but I do know where it continues – Fox News Channel.

Never has a media outlet so thoroughly insulted the intelligence of its viewers than Fox does by claiming "fair and balanced reporting." Fox News fair and balanced? Yeah, right, and I'm an Olympic marathon runner.

If Gore had been elected, and a Democrat had been in the Oval Office on Sept. 11, 2001, Fox News would still be running a ticker at the bottom of the screen counting the number of days without the capture of Osama bin Laden.

By the way, it's been 892 days.

Fox News' idea of "fair and balanced" is Hannity and Colmes. Sean Hannity is a self-described "arch conservative" and Alan Colmes refers to himself as a moderate. It seems clear to me an "arch conservative" and a "moderate" are not a "balanced" combination.

I realize Hannity and Colmes are political commentators, but this kind of programming dominates Fox's prime-time lineup; this from a "news" station.

Typically, I believe the media to be as liberal as the conservative businesses that own it. This would explain the lack of attention paid to real news as opposed to superficial or shocking stories.

Seriously, when giant corporations own nearly all the television stations (except PBS), magazines and newspapers, can one really expect them to focus on news that might hurt business?

This is not to say the conservative media leaves important issues untouched. No, that would be too blatantly biased. Instead, we are inundated with replays of Justin Timberlake and Janet Jackson at the Super Bowl.

Does anyone really believe a liberal news media would have made such a fuss over a nipple?

But Janet Jackson's nipple, Kobe Bryant, Martha Stewart, Robert Blake, Michael Jackson and Bennifer all get much more attention than Enron, World Com, or Halliburton's shady dealings do.

Trust me, folks, these are not the stories on which a liberal news media would focus.

Don't simply take any media source at face value. Check around, see if you can find the primary source of the information and then read it for yourself.

A good place to start is the Columbia Journalism Review (www.cjr.org). They monitor most newspapers and correct the errors they print.

The fact is people should start treating media the same way they ought to treat voting – do some research.

If people start examining so-called news sources for themselves, maybe this myth of the liberal media will fade away like Newt Gingrich did.

Liberals permanent fixture in news media; deal with it

GRANT REICHERT

Called the "shameful open secret of American journalism" by James Glassman in the Washington Post, liberal media bias is no Loch Ness Monster.

It exists, and the proof is in the polls.

Although logic usually dictates that having enough people believe something isn't grounds for its truthfulness, bias is unique.

Bias is not tangible.

It exists only in our perception of news contrasted with what we believe to be true. Therefore, polls that measure how we perceive news carry the utmost weight when seeking to gauge bias.

According to a survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, twice as many of those surveyed (51 percent) thought that the news generally had a liberal ideological tilt rather than a conservative one (26 percent).

A 2003 poll conducted by the Gallup Organization reported similar findings. By a 3-to-1 margin, those surveyed thought the press was too liberal rather than too conservative.

More stunningly, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press found in an October 2000 poll that 89 percent of Americans think reporters let personal politics influence coverage "often" 52 percent or "sometimes" 37 percent of the time.

I say stunning because these personal politics that 89 percent of Americans think are being inserted into supposedly objective reporting, are overwhelmingly liberal.

A survey of reporters in Washington conducted by the Freedom Forum and the Roper Center for public opinion research found that 61 percent described themselves as "liberal" or "liberal to moderate."

Even more amazing, 89 percent said they voted for Clinton.

Eric Alterman, author of "What Liberal Media?" has sent the left into paroxysms of joy with his denials of a liberal taint to the media.

He builds his case around selective anecdotal evidence, which no more disproves liberal bias than a cold day in April disproves global warming.

These people are paid for commentary, and everyone realizes they are giving their personal interpretations of the news. Bias is a problem when news media insinuate their personal predilections into supposedly objective news.

Bias deniers also inevitably bring up the Fox News Channel.

They spew wide-eyed, shrill accusations that Fox News is part of the Vast Right Wing Conspiracy which is Hillary's paranoid delusion. But the truth is Fox News' meteoric rise serves only to prove that a liberal slant exists on other channels, and that viewers appreciate a counterbalance.

Now, the question that Alterman should have been asking, "Why a liberal media?"

The real reasons are more institutional and basic.

Reporters fear they will incite racial tensions or incur the wrath of race warriors like Al Sharpton if they report critically on matters such as affirmative action, immigration and bilingual education.

Increasingly, reporters are liable to be sacrificed on the altar of political correctness if they offend a minority through their reporting.

The second cause of liberal bias is that the overwhelming numbers of liberals in the newsrooms of America lead to a stagnation of thought and rampant groupthink.

Bernard Goldberg, author of the book, "Bias," noted the tendency of liberal journalists to assume their views are the mainstream.

Goldberg wrote in a Wall Street Journal op-ed, "(journalists') views on all the big social issues ... aren't liberal at all.

They're simply reasonable views, shared by all the reasonable people the media elites mingle with at all their reasonable dinner parties in Manhattan and Georgetown."

Journalists think that their views are mainstream, because they and everyone they know have them. And, hey, if these views weren't mainstream, then why would they be on all the news programs?

Federal court may reconsider decision in Roe v. Wade case

By Lisa Falkenberg
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALLAS – A federal appeals court has agreed to hear a request from the woman formerly known as "Jane Roe" to reconsider the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision Roe v. Wade that legalized abortion.

Norma McCorvey, who joined with anti-abortion activists nearly 10 years ago, is seeking to have the decision overturned, citing what she says is more than 30 years of evidence that abortions are psychologically harmful.

A federal district judge threw out her initial request in June, saying it was not made within a reasonable time. But the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has agreed to hear McCorvey's arguments March 2.

"It's something that I've wanted ever since Day One, and it's happening," McCorvey said from her Dallas home.

Dallas County District Attorney Bill Hill, whose predecessor Henry Wade was named in the original lawsuit, has not filed a response to McCorvey's appeal. That may put the appeals court in the unusual position of hearing arguments from only one side.

Wade was named in the original case because he was charged with enforcing the Texas law that prevented McCorvey from having an abortion. Hill's office has argued that since that law no longer exists, Hill has no authority to prosecute and should not be sued.

More than 20 Texas law school professors concerned about an unbalanced hearing filed a brief Wednesday asking to be allowed to argue the other side of the case.

"It's important that the court hear from somebody representing the position that the district court took, which I think is clearly right," said David Schenck, a lawyer representing the professors. "At this point, the case is moot, and she's presenting at best a political question."

The Supreme Court decision came after McCorvey had her baby. The baby was the third child McCorvey put up for adoption; she was a 21-year-old carnival worker at the time.

Accused murderer to go to trial 30 years after crime

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. – A former custodian accused of killing a suburban Kansas City girl almost 30 years ago will stand trial for the slaying, a Johnson County judge decided Thursday.

John Henry Horton, 56, is charged with first-degree felony murder in the death of 13-year-old Lizabeth Wilson. She disappeared in July 1974 while walking home from the swimming pool in Prairie Village, Kan. Her skeletal remains were found six months later in a field in Lenexa, another community in suburban Johnson County, Kan.

Johnson County Judge James Franklin Davis ruled Thursday there was enough evidence to try Horton in the case. Horton's attorney entered an innocent plea on Horton's behalf following the ruling.

Horton had been a suspect in the case 30 years ago, but he wasn't charged until last October after investigators reopened their investigation. Prosecutors believe Lizabeth encountered Horton while walking across a parking lot at Shawnee Mission East High School, where Horton worked as a custodian.

In his ruling, Davis said he took into account the testimony of a woman who said Horton molested her earlier in the summer of 1974, when she was 14 years old.

The woman, who testified Wednesday, said that one evening that summer she went to a golf course along with Horton and his niece "to get high."

The woman, now 43, said she lost consciousness after inhaling some liquid Horton poured onto a rag.

When she woke up, she was lying on her back, unable to move or speak, and Horton was molesting her, she told the court. The woman said she never told anyone what had happened because she didn't want to get in trouble.

After Horton was arrested last year, investigators sought her out and showed her a lineup of photographs, including one of Horton taken in 1974. She identified him as the man who was with her at the golf course.

Kansas Bureau of Investigation agent Bill Halvorsen said investigators found out about the woman from Horton's niece, Cynthia Owens. He said Owens told agents she saw Horton administer the drug to her friend.

Horton's attorney, Michael McCulloch, argued the judge should not take into account the alleged attack on the golf course in deciding whether his client should stand trial for Wilson's death.

Horton is being held in the Johnson County Jail on $1 million bond. The judge scheduled a hearing on pretrial motions for April 12. No trial date was set.

CU coach deserves blame

LOUIE NOVAK

What in the wild, wild world of sports is going on with the University of Colorado football program?

For the past three weeks, Colorado has been bombarded with a list of accusations against the football program, including rapes, strip-club visits and alcohol-fueled sex parties for recruits.

The latest installment into this soap opera came Wednesday night.

The university held a hastily arranged news conference and placed Barnett on administrative leave pending the outcome of an investigation into the program.

Barnett was placed on paid leave by university President Elizabeth Hoffman, who said in a statement she was "utterly distressed" over comments the so-called "coach" made in a 2001 police report filed by another woman who said a football player raped her.

An independent committee will investigate the long list of allegations involving the porno Barnett calls a football program.

Barnett said he did not agree with Hoffman's decision to suspend him, but apologized and accepted the decision, calling himself a "team player."

The move to suspend Barnett came one day after he talked smack on the performance of former Buffalo place-kicker Katie Hnida, who claims she was raped by a teammate four years ago.

Barnett called Hnida an "awful" player and said she "couldn't kick the ball through the uprights."

Hnida now plays for the University of New Mexico and told Sports Illustrated she was harassed and groped by teammates in addition to the assault.

The accusations involving Colorado football that have surfaced over the past three weeks stem from civil lawsuits filed by three women against the school.

Each claims she was raped by players or recruits at or after an off-campus party in 2001.

To make matters worse, an adult entertainment company also has said CU players regularly hired strippers for parties.

The university acknowledged that an escort service was called from a cell phone that had been assigned to a former football recruiting aide.

Barnett was hired to coach Colorado's football team five years ago with the goal of ending an era of loose recruiting practices and return the team to national prominence.

Barnett needs to walk away from the mess he created.

If this is the way he intended to end the old recruiting practices, then obviously he has been on a steady dose of crazy pills.

As for national prominence, CU is now a topic of discussion on every news media outlet and is a national embarrassment.

Barnett is the one to blame.

I know that players make mistakes, and there isn't a football program that is perfect.

However, it is apparent that Barnett has lost control of his team, and when things go bad, everyone looks at the head coach.

There is no valid excuse Barnett could ever give that would make me believe he was completely unaware of the issues that have come up.

It is a matter of time before the school drops the hammer on ol' Barnett.

The only advice I can give is for him to walk away while he still has the chance.

Baseball takes on Western Illinois

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last week, Coach Brad Hill opened his K-State career in Minute Maid Park, the home of the Houston Astros, at the Minute Maid Classic.

On Sunday, the Wildcats squared off against the defending national champion Rice Owls, the nation's No. 1-ranked team.

If that was the high point of the young season, this weekend's games against Western Illinois has all the potential to be a low point.

Due to inclement field conditions, the originally scheduled home games will be played at Allen County Community College in Iola, Kan.

While it may not be what his team had been expecting, Hill said this change in plans could tell him a lot about his squad.

"In baseball and athletics in general, good teams deal with adversity," Hill said. "Adversity can come from injuries, or it can come from where you're playing."

Game time
K-State vs. Western Illinois
When: Noon Saturday and Sunday
Where: Allen County Community College in Iola, Kan.

The playing field isn't the only change the Cats will see this weekend.

Hill said adjustments in his lineup can be expected, as it will take the coaching staff awhile to see where everyone fits into the lineup.

"It's going to be another three to four weeks before we have some things deciphered and know who can do what and get some expectations out of guys," Hill said.

"We still don't know much."

One guy who threw a crinkle into Hill's plans is freshman third baseman Eli Rumler. Seeing his first collegiate start in the Cats' 12-6 win over Ohio State, the Maize, Kan., product made the most of his opportunity.

Rumler went 2-for-4 against the Buckeyes with four RBI, three of which came on a bases-loaded triple.

But aside from Rumler and all-tournament nominee Marc Chabot, Hill said the Cats never really came around offensively.

It was the pitching of Carlos Torres, who notched his first win of the season against the Buckeyes, that really caught Hill's eyes.

"Eli Rumler had a great second game," Hill said.

"Offensively, we were just inconsistent. There wasn't anybody who had an outstanding weekend. Marc Chabot made the all-tournament team, but other than that Carlos Torres really stood out more than anybody because he pitched so effectively."

But perhaps the biggest thrill for Hill was watching his team beat Ohio State.

Going into the weekend, Hill said no one expected them to come back victorious except themselves.

"People who know college baseball probably had us penciled in at 0-3 because of the tradition of those programs," Hill said.

"But that's not the way we went down there and approached it."

This weekend, Hill said the real test is going to be dealing with the fact that they will be playing what were once home games on the road.

It will be the character of the Cats, as well as Western Illinois, that Hill said will be the most difficult opponent this weekend.

"Adversity to me tests our character, and we'll see what kind of character we have," Hill said.

Women's golf team to compete Monday

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women's golf coach Kristi Knight has plenty to be excited about in her ninth season at K-State.

With six of eight players returning from last year's team that placed 10th at regionals, the Wildcats are poised to have one of the best seasons in school history.

"There's potential for the program to accomplish big things," she said. "I'm blessed with a group of good players with good attitudes. I think we can do something special."

The Wildcats finished third last year in their first appearance at the tournament, which features competition K-State will see again this season.

"Most of our regional teams will be there," junior Sarah Heffel said. "We want to see how we match up with them and get a feel for what we need to work on."

The invitational also allows the Wildcats to start the year on a positive note.

"Tournaments in February can set the tone for your spring," Knight said. "We want to be in a good position in March and April to finish the season strong."

Perhaps just as importantly, the tournament gives the team a chance to finally play outdoors. The weather has been an early-season obstacle, forcing the team to practice in the Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

"We're at a little bit of a disadvantage, but most teams in the tournament have been in the same situation," Knight said. "We just have to deal with it.

"There are no guarantees in golf. Coming out of bad weather doesn't mean you're going to play bad golf."

With a veteran team including four players who had top-10 finishes at tournaments last fall, the Wildcats know what it will take to make a fourth consecutive trip to regionals this year.

"Experience will help us a lot this year," Heffel said. "Most of the girls have already played the courses we'll play this season."

The team will try to build from where it left off in November. The Wildcats finished the fall season ranked 37th in the nation by Golfstat.

"We sat down in the fall and saw where we were and where we wanted to be," Knight said. "We want the success from the fall to carry over."

Where the Wildcats want to be at the end of the season is Auburn, Ala., for the NCAA Championships.

"We're looking forward to nationals," Heffel said. "We were so close last year. Nationals is our main goal."

One Wildcat who already has experienced nationals is Boucher.

She was 64th at the meet last year, and the 2003 First Team All-Big 12 player shows no signs of letting up this year.

She finished in the top five in every fall tournament with two wins. She also sits atop the school record book in three individual statistical categories.

"After my experience at nationals last year, I want to experience it with the team," she said.

The journey to nationals starts again for Boucher and the Wildcats on Monday.

"I was pleased with my fall," she said. "I want to get off to a good start at Florida. I want to play good golf like I know I'm capable of and see where it takes me and the team."

NFL | Clarett to skip combine to get in shape

Maurice Clarett was more prepared to handle questions Thursday than he was to perform for NFL scouts.

Clarett

The running back, who won a challenge to the NFL's draft system, announced he would skip Friday's workouts at the scouting combine because he wanted more time to train after missing all of last season due to of a suspension.

Scouts must now wait until April to see Clarett's audition, a decision that angered some of the NFL's top evaluators.

Clarett, 20, will become the first true sophomore in the NFL draft but said his mother advised him not to work out at the combine.

There was another reason, too.

Clarett weighed in at 237 pounds, seven pounds higher than his playing weight at Ohio State, and he acknowledged he wasn't in top condition despite training the past couple weeks.

NBA | Gugliotta traded to Jazz for final year of contract

Tom Gugliotta came to the Phoenix Suns as a star forward who averaged 20 points a game in the previous two seasons. Nearly six years later, he left as a player who rarely got off the bench.

The Suns traded the one-time all-star to the Utah Jazz on Thursday for two injured players forward-centers Keon Clark and Ben Handlogten. The Jazz also got two conditional first-round draft picks, a 2005 second-round pick and an undisclosed amount of cash.

Gugliotta, who averaged 2.3 points and 1.9 rebounds in 30 games this season, is earning $11.6 million in the final year of a six-year contract.

As part of the trade, Phoenix will give up the least-favorable of its two first-round picks in the 2004 draft — either its own or the selection it got from New York in a previous trade. The second conditional first-round pick also came from New York and is protected through 2010.

MLB | Extra ticket sales help A-Rod pay for himself

In just four days, Alex Rodriguez has nearly paid for himself this year, at least as far as the New York Yankees are concerned.

Rodriguez

New York has sold nearly 104,000 tickets worth a total of $2 million since Monday, when it acquired the American League MVP from the Texas Rangers.

The sales are double the amount for the same period last year, the team said Thursday.

By acquiring Rodriguez, the Yankees committed themselves to an additional $1.6 million in salary this year — they owe him $14 million and are saving $12.4 million in what would have been paid to Aaron Boone, Drew Henson and Alfonso Soriano.

CBB | NCAA puts Bonnies on 3 years' probation

St. Bonaventure's men's basketball team was put on three years' probation Thursday and barred from the 2004 postseason for an eligibility scandal.

The Atlantic Ten and St. Bonaventure were caught off guard Thursday when the NCAA added a postseason ban to the penalties assessed to the Bonnies.

Citing "a lack of institutional control," the NCAA also cut two of the team's scholarships for 2004 and one for 2005.

In addition, recruiting visits by coaches and players were reduced. The Atlantic 10 will convene to decide whether St. Bonaventure will be allowed to play in the A-10 tournament.

Inspiration comes from pop culture, original ideas

"I like to do the super real-looking stuff. It's uncommon, and I can do that," he said.

However, Miller does not always express his dark style in his work, as there is such a variety of things that people want to get done.

Kiffnie Holt, graduate student in entomology, is not passionate about the macabre mode in which Miller specializes. She's all about bugs.

Holt has 10 tattoos, nine of which are insects or spiders. Her theme is predators or parasitic insects from the Midwest, most of which can be found in Kansas. If she wears anything revealing her work it usually leads to conversation.

"The best tattoos are ones that hold personal meaning for you. With an artist like Robert at your disposal, the possibilities are infinite," Holt said. "Choose an image or theme that you are passionate about, one that says something about your life."

She also plans to finish her back piece with a nature-oriented background showing where her bugs can be found in nature. Holt said she is going to give Robert free reign on what he does for the background because she's confident he will do an excellent job, and he has the trophies to prove it.

Daren Lewis, 2002 K-State graduate, took two or three years to figure out his self-designed winged back piece that pays homage to industrial music. He said it took a lot of planning and just as much saving.

He and his wife, Crystal, both have back-art with a similar theme, when combined, adds up to 35 hours of work. Lewis agreed it was well worth it, and plans on getting much more custom work done.

"I'm very against doing flash. I'm into custom tattoos only," Lewis said. (Flash is the typical art on the wall found in most parlors.)

Although Miller does a lot of fantasy-style tattoos, his wisdom regarding his trade is frighteningly in tune to reality within the tattoo culture.

"Girlfriend/boyfriend tattoos are the most common to get covered up. Coverups need a lot of black (ink), which translates to time and money. "Tattoos are forever. Love isn't," Miller said.

Some of the most recognizable logos and symbols also happen to be some the the most played-out tattoos. Miller's low-end estimate is that he's done close to 1,000 barbed wire armbands.

Other cliche tattoos include Japanese symbols, the Godsmack sun, the A Perfect Circle logo, tribal bands, the Superman "S" and Looney Tunes characters.

Miller said he urges people to take a tip from the professionals and be original thinkers.

He met a customer who wanted the triple-X done on the back of his neck exactly like Vin Diesel from the summer 2002 movie, "XXX".

"People want to copy their idols, and it can get a little ridiculous,"Miller said. He is aware of the bad art that people settle for.

"I redo other artists' work and find the person who got the bad tattoo had no idea of what their work could have looked like," Miller said. "People don't often see high-quality tattoos, and they're not aware of what is really good, or what is possible."

Miller said a bad tattoo usually is the artist's fault. They're bad because the artist might have gone too fast or too deep, or raked the needle across the skin, which causes scarring.

Miller said those interested in getting anything done should do research about the artist who will be doing the work.

"If they don't have any examples to show you, there's a reason for it. Good tattoos aren't cheap, and cheap tattoos aren't good. Homemade tattoos are some of the worst I've ever seen," Miller said.

"Don't be fooled. Just because someone can draw doesn't mean they can do tattoos."

JJay Bokelman, who does everything but tattooing and piercing at Stray Cat, said high-quality pieces are those that have been well thought-out. He said he can't understand why anyone would just want to get a tattoo just for the sake of having one.

"What sets people with good tattoos apart from others is the dedication to the art. There's definitely an unspoken respect among people who've had high-quality art done. It may not amount to more than a nod, but it's there," Bokelman said.

Robert Miller, a Stray Cat Tattoo artist, looks at the example of a Wheel bug Kiffnie Holt, graduate student in entomology, brought in to help him design the tattoo she wants Thursday night. Miller has been a tattoo artist for 14 years.

Simosa's attitude after injury motivates team

By Kelly Olson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's tennis team is looking to improve its 2-2 record Sunday after a loss to Iowa last weekend.

The competition will be fierce as Southwest Missouri State looks to gain a win to its losing season. Bears' coach Jim Giachino will bring six players to match the six clad in purple.

Last week during a match against Iowa No. 2, Jessica Simosa was in pain because she sprained her ankle. She will return to the court this week.

Born in 1984 in Valencia, Venezuela, Simosa's father, Rafael, knew that Jessica would one day be a tennis player. At the age of 9, she started lessons twice a week with no serious intentions about the game.

By the age of 14, Simosa was practicing every day with a more competitive coach. This was the beginning of victorious matches locally, regionally and nationally.

When Simosa was 16 years old, she was the No. 1 player in Venezuela, a ranking she continued to hold through the age of 18. Traveling all over South America, she gained quality wins over outstanding players.

Simosa was then No. 234 in the world rankings.

She was also part of the Fed Cup pre-team representing Venezuela and played professional tournaments. When she reached the age of 18, Simosa came to America.

Coach Steve Bietau noticed Simosa in January of 2002, after seeing her skills on the courts in Miami. Although not knowing fluent English, Simosa gained a scholarship and residence at K-State.

"I had a bit of trouble adjusting to the people and the system. Practice was really hard. I discovered I was out of shape, but by early spring 2003, I was getting used to the new way of life," Simosa said.

During her time at K-State, Simosa has earned a two-time Big 12 Commissioner's Honor Roll selection and the 2002-03 ITA Scholar-Athlete.

Simosa has battled leaving her home country, learning a new language and lifestyle, and just recently, her injury.

She looks to this weekend for positive results.

"I am sure we can have some positive results against SMS this weekend. If we don't beat them, at least we are getting ready for conference," she said.

That positive attitude seems to be contagious to the team.

"Jessica is very talented, and I don't think she is even near her potential. I hope she gets there before she is done with the tennis program here, because she will be a force to be reckoned with," teammate Hayley McIver said. "She is always cheerful and tends to spread that around. She always seems to find the positive side in situations."

When off the courts, Simosa spends her time working on her business management and economics majors, as well as her French minor. She aspires to acquire a master's degree and work in Europe.

need to find a mechanism to create a caretaker government and then prepare the elections ... sometime later," Annan said.

Iraq's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Husseini al-Sistani, disrupted the American plan for the handover by calling for an early election and opposing caucuses. Most of the Governing Council's 25 members, who agreed to the caucuses in November, now say they want that formula dropped.

"Changes are possible, but the date holds," Bremer told reporters.

"There are literally dozens of ways in which to carry out this very complicated task," he said, including variations on the caucuses or "varying other kinds of elections, partial elections."

The Bush administration is under pressure from its Iraqi partners and international allies to yield power and end the military occupation as soon as possible. It is also eager to establish a working government and give Iraqi security forces a frontline role against guerrilla violence well ahead of November presidential elections.

On Thursday, insurgents killed two American soldiers in a roadside bombing near Khaldiyah, 50 miles west of the capital, the U.S. command said. The deaths brought to 545 the number of American service members who have died since the war began March 20.

The U.S. plan calls for Iraqi elections in 2005, but Shiite leaders say they want a vote sooner, even if it can't be before June 30. Shiites, believed to make up about 60 percent of Iraq's 25 million people, likely would dominate any elected government.

On Thursday, Ahmad al-Barak, a Shiite council member, said after meeting with al-Sistani that the Shiites were hoping for an early election but would be willing to wait.

"I think that elections can be held after five months from now, and in that case we have no problem," al-Barak said.

"Power could be transferred to the Iraqi people through the Governing Council or any other body."

Expanding the council could make it more broadly representative, but Shiites have said any expansion must respect the current alignment of power. Shiites now hold 13 of the 25 council seats.

The Governing Council is also drafting an interim constitution due to take effect at the end of the month. Bremer, who must approve the document, suggested this week he would block an attempt to make Islam the primary basis of law in Iraq.

In the current draft, Islam would be "a source of inspiration for the law," but not the main source, according to Bremer. Setting Islamic law as the primary source could lead to major changes in Iraq's largely secular system, particularly concerning women's rights.

On Thursday, Bremer said the council agreed in November on the principle that the constitution will "recognize the Islamic character of the majority of the Iraqi people and that there should be freedom of religion, freedom of religious practices and equality before the law for all individuals."

"I'm assuming the Governing Council will stick with what it said," he said, adding an agreement will be reached on the document "on schedule by next week."

UNION | Food Court to close at 5:30 p.m. starting Monday

moving a closing time to 5:30 p.m., not earlier, because members said there were quite a few students who eat around 5 p.m.

"Probably some students will be disappointed, but overall it will save us some money. And those who are hungry will still have an option of going down to Union Station and getting something to eat," Baker said.

Union Station will stay open until 9 p.m., Thober said.

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said the assortment of dishes available Union Station would be wider after the food court closes.

Pitts said lasagna, spaghetti and other Italian dishes would be available after 5:30 p.m., in addition to all-time salads, sandwiches and soups.

"I've never used the food court after 5:30 anyway. I sometimes have a lunch here, but usually I eat at home," Schmidt said.

"Architecture students usually eat during those hours, so it's going to affect me a lot," Pickett said.

He said he and his fellow students usually have to stay on campus for the entire day, so it was convenient to have a place to eat late in the day just across Seaton Hall, which houses the College of Architecture, Planning and Design.

Pickett said Union Station probably would not be an equivalent replacement since it doesn't offer "a real food like real burgers and real tacos".

While some students might be unpleased with the measure, Pitts said it was Union's obligation to students.

"We are stewards of the students' fees, and we need to take these actions to be good stewards of those funds. We can't continue operate on deficit," Pitts said.

The Union Dining Services lost $62,000 in January, Thober said.

COLORADO | Coach suspended after allegations

Colorado president Elizabeth Hoffman also said she was dismayed by comments attributed to Barnett in a 2001 police report filed by another woman who said she was raped by a football player.

The report quoted an unidentified woman saying Barnett told her he "would back his player 100 percent" if rape charges were pursued.

Barnett will remain on leave while a special committee investigates the Hnida case and lawsuits by three women who say they were assaulted by players and high school recruits during or after an off-campus party in 2001. The committee's first meeting will be March 2. In all, football athletes have been accused of rape in seven cases dating to 1997.

Hoffman and other university officials have said only that everyone's job is on the line, including that of Barnett.

University Regent Jim Martin said putting Barnett on leave was the right move.

"Having said that, he should not be the fall guy for the culture," Martin said.

"I'll guarantee you, Gary Barnett is not the problem with that culture. Gary Barnett is a football coach. Football is a big entertainment business.

"This goes to all levels of the university, and while he made disparaging remarks about Katie Hnida and sex assaults that happened on his watch, he is not the only individual that ought to be looked at."

The investigation must conclude by April 30, which means Barnett will miss spring drills scheduled for April 2-24.

An interim head coach, most likely a current assistant, is expected to be named this week.

2 Fort Riley soldiers die

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two Fort Riley soldiers died of injuries sustained from small arms fire and an improvised explosive device attack Thursday near Khalidiyah, Iraq.

Second Lt. Jeffrey Graham, 24, was a platoon leader for Company C. Originally from Elizabethtown, Ky., Graham joined the army in May 2003 and had been stationed at Fort Riley in October before being deployed to Iraq in November.

Spc. Roger Ling, 20, was from Douglaston, N.Y. He was an armor crewman for Company C. Ling joined the Army in November 2001 and was stationed at Fort Riley in May 2002 before being deployed to Iraq in September 2003.

Both solders were assigned to the Company C, 1st Battalion, 34th Armor, 1st Brigade, 1st Infantry Division.

Former KSU dean named new provost

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A former K-Stater has been named the new provost.

Duane Nellis will replace James Coffman, who will step down in July as the university's chief academic officer.

Nellis spent 17 years at K-State as an assistant geography professor, head of the department and senior associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. He has served as the dean of the Eberly College of Arts and Sciences at West Virginia University for the last seven years.

Nellis was chosen from three candidates.

"His experience at Kansas State, in addition to seven years as a dean at a major land-grant university, has prepared him for the position of provost at Kansas State," said Charles Reagan, chair of the search committee.

As provost, Nellis is responsible for implementing the president's plan, Reagan said.

Reagan said Nellis has much-needed experience.

"Someone who has been here knows the culture, knows many of the players and the history of the university, and those are all important in getting things done," he said.

Campus leader stays out of limelight

By Lauren Bishop
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Keener Tippin is a leader, but he prefers to be in the background rather than in the limelight.

In fact, if someone had told Tippin, media relations coordinator, that he would be in the position he is in now during his days at Lincoln University, he would have just laughed.

"I guess people just see something in me that I don't," he said.

Michelle Hall, media relations coordinator, has worked alongside Tippin for the past year and does just that.

"He does so well communicating with students, and they feel they can come talk to him with anything," she said.

Helping students is something Tippin has taken the time to do in part because of the inspiration he has attained from watching his father, who worked at the University of Missouri.

"Even though I was envious of the time my father spent with the other kids he worked with, I realized how he touched so many people's lives, and that is something special," he said.

Although Tippin jokes that he won't become

Nader joins presidential election as independent

Democrats concerned about division among liberal voters

By Sam Hananel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. – Consumer advocate Ralph Nader announced Sunday he is running again for president, this time as an independent, and rejected claims that a longshot candidacy would merely siphon enough votes from the Democrats to ensure President Bush's re-election.

Nader

Nader's decision was greeted with a chorus of condemnation from Democrats, longtime friends and former supporters who blame him for Al Gore's loss four years ago. They suggested that Nader would not pull close to the 2.7 percent of the vote he won before without the backing of an established party and some of his past supporters.

Republicans resisted the temptation to gloat as party chairman Ed Gillespie proclaimed that Bush would win a second term no matter who runs. Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, a former Republican National Committee chairman, said, "It will make less difference than the Democrats fear, but I know they're very nervous about it."

In getting into the White House sweepstakes, Nader declared that Washington has become "corporate occupied territory," and he accused both Democrats and Republicans of being dominated by corporate lobbyists who "care little" about the needs of ordinary Americans.

"It's a question between both parties flunking," Nader said on NBC's "Meet the Press," where he chose to make his announcement. He asserted that "it's time to change the equation and bring millions of American people into the political arena."

Nader said he will mount a national campaign as an independent to highlight issues he claims the major parties are ignoring, including universal health care, rising poverty and environmental concerns.

Student overcomes race to lead others

Quadriyyah Musawwir, right, junior in family studies and human services, responds to her friend answering a question right in the "Who Wants to be a 20 Dollarnaire" contest Feb. 16 in the Union Courtyard. Musawwir is the multicultural chair for the Union Program Council.

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The odds are against Quadriyyah Musawwir.

She's female.

She's black.

She's Muslim.

She's a single parent.

But for Musawwir, junior in family studies and human services, it's not about stacking up the odds. It's about overcoming them to become a student leader on the K-State campus.

Musawwir is the multicultural chair for the Union Program Council.

As the chair, she is responsible for coordinating all types of diversity events, including the monthly Festival of Nations celebrations, as well as a committee of 15 students.

In addition, Musawwir holds office hours and attends various meetings during the week.

Her leadership style, she said, is unique.

She's not a dictator, but her colleagues know when she means business.

"I'm not a pushover," Musawwir said. "I don't like dictating, but I will tell them when something needs to get done."

She's not new to leadership, either.

In middle school and high school, Musawwir was involved in various leadership positions for clubs and events. She was also the go-to girl when friends needed help.

"I've always been a leader," Musawwir said. "People always come to me and ask for advice."

When she came to K-State, however, Musawwir had a different leadership role.

"I was the only black person or female in my class," she said. "I overcame that. I don't see it as black and white anymore – we're just students."

Natalie Rolfe, president of the Black Student Union and multicultural committee member, said Musawwir's strength has enabled her to succeed

State car sale
The state made more than $500,000 by selling 147 of its vehicles over two weeks at Forbes Field. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius said the average price paid during the sell-off of high-mileage cars, vans and trucks was about $3,500. A total of $526,019 was raised by the sales, which ended Thursday.

Captured city
Rebels captured Haiti's second-largest city, Cap-Haitien, claiming their biggest prize in a two-week uprising that has driven government forces from most of the country's north. Revelers shot celebratory rounds into the air, and people looted and torched buildings.

Uganda attack
Rebels armed with assault rifles, mortars and rocket-propelled grenades attacked a refugee camp in Uganda and torched huts, killing 192. The attack was one of the worst in recent years by the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group that has been fighting the government for 17 years.

Suicide bomber
A Palestinian suicide bomber blew himself up on a crowded Jerusalem bus Sunday, killing eight passengers one day before the world court was to begin hearings on Israel's disputed West Bank barrier. Israeli officials said the suicide bombing proved the need to continue building the barrier.

WORLD IN REVIEW: 7 THINGS YOU DIDN'T KNOW 7 DAYS AGO

Dean exits presidential race

Toby Talbot | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean, right, tosses a snowball during a picture-taking event with his staff at campaign headquarters in South Burlington, Vt., Thursday. Dean withdrew Wednesday from the presidential race.

Staff and wire reports

He went into the Iowa caucus without having lost an election.

In a matter of hours, Howard Dean, was sitting in a distant third place behind John Kerry and John Edwards.

Dean then ended his full-throttle concession speech with a scream that has played endlessly on the Internet and late-night talk shows.

Dean's campaign came to an end Wednesday when Dean announced he was no longer seeking the presidency. He did not announce which candidate he would endorse, if any.

AT THE KERRY CAMP

"A win is a win." So said John Kerry after a nail-biting victory in Wisconsin last week.

John Edwards made it interesting by snatching up the independent vote – they preferred Edwards by more than 2-to-1.

Kerry has won 14 of 16 contests thus far.

AN ENRON UPDATE

Skilling

Former Enron CEO, Jeffrey Skilling, turned himself in to the FBI on Thursday but entered an innocent plea on charges of insider trading.

Skilling's attorneys said prosecutors are making a "grave mistake" by charging Skilling, saying he has done nothing wrong.

NO DEAL FOR MICKEY

Cable provider Comcast said it would not raise its bid to buy Disney – a deal that would have made the corporation one of the largest media conglomerates in the nation.

On the brighter side, Disney did announce that long-time couple Mickey and Minnie were tying the knot. Unfortunately, that wasn't enough for Comcast.

LOOK WHO'S BIGGER

Cingular Wireless has agreed to acquire the third-largest mobile phone provider, AT&T Wireless, for more than $40 billion – a deal that will create the nation's largest subscription base.

Verizon Wireless reported 37.5 million subscribers.

The Cingular-AT&T combo would reach a combined 46 million.

MSNBC OUSTS PRESIDENT

Kaplan

MSNBC is tired of third place.

To beat top-rated Fox News and second-rated CNN, the network announced that Rick Kaplan would replace Erik Sorenson as its president.

Kaplan was overseeing "World News Tonight" at Disney-owned ABC.

GET YOUR JESUS NAILS

Replicas of the nails used to hang Jesus on the cross have become the red-hot official merchandise linked to Mel Gibson's controversial new movie, "The Passion of the Christ."

Selling for $16.99, the nails all but flew out of the Christian Publications Bookstore on West 43rd Street in New York City as soon as they were put on display.

Hundreds of stores across the country will be selling licensed items tied to the movie, which opens this week on Ash Wednesday.

The souvenirs include a book, pins, key chains, coffee mugs and T-shirts.

Habitat donates home to family

By Gary Nap
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Habitat for Humanity handed over the keys to the 14th home built in the past 10 years and blessed the ground for the 15th home on Sunday.

The home, at 521 S. Manhattan Ave., was a collaboration between members of the community and local Lutheran churches.

Funds for the construction of the home were contributed by members of the community. Thrivent Financial for Lutherans donated $20,000 to begin the home.

Local Lutheran volunteers raised an additional $10,000 through an assortment of fundraising endeavors. Other funding came from Habitat's Builders Club, a group of individuals, businesses and organizations that agrees to give a set amount every time Habitat for Humanity breaks ground.

The house cost about $45,000 to build.

Several hundred people have donated time, money and materials to the new home since the groundbreaking last June.

To be eligible, Habitat families must fulfill certain criteria. Habitat selects families on their level of need, their ability to pay back a 20-year, no-interest mortgage and their willingness to help in the creation of their own home.

Adults are required to work at least 200 hours of "sweat equity" toward the construction of their own home. Children are also required to work. They must do between 10 and 60 hours of work, depending on their age.

The last requirement is that the family must have an annual income of at least $14,000 to cover the expenses of owning a house.

"We put the minimum income requirement in there because we do not want to burden these families," Elise Lambert, executive director of Habitat, said.

The ground blessing of the next house to be built for Alicia Silva and her son T.J. took place Sunday as well.

The house will be built next door to the Reichs, and Emily Ross, who works with Habitat, said the house is expected to be done by July.

Fort Riley soldiers return home from year in Iraq

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT RILEY, Kan. – Fifty-three soldiers who returned to Fort Riley from Iraq on Saturday were the first group of about 3,000 expected to come home over the next two months.

Those who returned Saturday were part of the 937th Engineer Group, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, and had been on a yearlong deployment. Maj. Gen. Dennis Hardy, commanding general of the 24th Infantry Division and Fort Riley, noted all of the 937th returned alive.

About 200 friends and family members woke before dawn to meet the men and women upon arrival at 6 a.m. Hardy welcomed them back in a speech.

"You are now veterans," Hardy said. "You have gone in harm's way ... what we know we are about in this world is stability, peace and freedom for people who have never really known freedom."

The 937th Engineer Group saw its mission change during its time in Iraq. As the 3rd Infantry Division advanced into Baghdad, the 937th was providing support. More recently, the 937th worked on renovation plans for Iraqi army facilities.

Diana Jones, whose son, Pfc. Ryan Jones, was among those returning from Iraq on Saturday, came all the way from Houston, Texas, to welcome him home.

"When I see him I am going to just hug him and cry," Diana said.

Nader should support Democratic nominee

Every American deserves a vote. They deserve even more a vote that counts.

Nader announced Sunday he will seek the presidency as an independent candidate.

This upset many Democrats who blame Nader for splitting the votes in an already-close 2000 election. Without the distraction, the election easily could have gone in Al Gore's favor.

He claims he is running this year to give more Americans a voice to counteract the standard two-party dominance.

Nader's political views would be better served by directing potential votes to the Democrat nominee most closely aligned with his views, creating change in the White House.

Nader, who supports universal health care, rising poverty and environmental concerns, should work with the Democratic nominee to address these issues in his campaign.

Every American deserves a voice in the election of their leader, but that vote means more if it can actually make a difference.

With Nader running, the winner will ultimately be Bush – the candidate farthest away from the ideals of Nader's supporters.

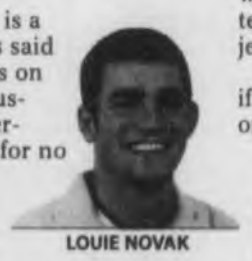
He Said / She Said



TWO SIDES OF THE STORY: THE RIGHT SIDE AND THE OTHER SIDE

Cry babies

Guys learn early not to cry in public

My favorite columnist, Rick Reilly of Sports Illustrated, once said, "Women can fake tears, breasts and orgasms, but men are pretty much stuck to the truth in these departments."

Nasrina admits she is a frequent crier. She has said she turns the fountains on when she is "angry, frustrated, happy, sad, overwhelmed, laughing or for no reason at all."

LOUIE NOVAK

Hard to believe that K-State's evil succubous has a soft side, huh?

The problem with Nasrina and other females is that when you cry all the time, the act loses its significance.

Other than a few men who often go overboard (like Kansas City Chiefs head coach Dick Vermeil and North Carolina basketball coach Roy "Benedict" Williams), a man crying is a true expression of his emotions and carries weight because it is a rarity.

Now, don't get me wrong I'm not saying a girl crying isn't a true expression of the pain she feels when Ross and Rachel do whatever they do on "Friends."

I'm just saying it is more common to see a female get worked up over something trivial. Bonding is being able to break out the tissues with her girlfriends.

It's a fact that most men have a difficult time expressing their feelings, especially when it comes to crying.

From the time I was little, I like most men, was taught not to cry for a number of reasons.

I was brought up to be tough and had the notion it was a feminine characteristic and seen as a sign of weakness to shed tears.

I learned if you did break down and cry, you better have a good reason, or else you would be subject to some serious name calling.

This was an extremely difficult thing for someone as emotional and eccentric as myself with which to deal.

I can admit that movies like "Big Fish," "Field of Dreams" and "Forrest Gump" have forced me to bite my lip and make unsuccessful attempts to keep the flood gates closed.

However, I still am not willing to break down in public.

Even though I have shown to some past lady friends I can be "in touch with my inner-most feelings," there is no way I am willing to let go in front of my boys.

It's just not right.

It is an unwritten rule that unless something serious or traumatic has happened, guys who cry are wimps.

One of the few exceptions to this rule can be found in the world of sports.

When a famous sports figure retires, wins or loses a big game or gives an interview that touches on a personal subject, we find it admirable.

This is quite rare and is only accepted if the athlete is a bad-ass like Brett Favre or Reggie Miller.

All in all, guys don't cry – chicks do.

Maybe one day men will put the macho stuff on hold and open our hearts and give ourselves permission to share a good cry.

Thing is, I wouldn't hold my breath waiting on it.

Louie is a senior in mass communications. You can e-mail him at opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Men who cry are strong, courageous

Crying is not just for babies.

I'm willing to admit to being a crier.

I cry when I am angry, frustrated, happy, sad, overwhelmed, laughing or for no reason at all.

The problem is, my crying jags occasionally have caused me to be labeled as an emotionally unstable PMS queen.

NASRINA WILLIAMS

Why is a biological expression of emotion and feeling (a.k.a. crying) viewed in such a negative manner?

Because it makes males uncomfortable.

I don't know many guys who are secure enough to cry in public or even in front of their close friends for that matter. They either keep their tears private or use them to manipulate women who have caught them cheating (yes, Louie, I'm talking about you).

Most men have been socialized to view crying as a sign of weakness. It is an act that symbolizes an inherent lack of self-control, which they expect from women and ridicule in men.

This simply is not true.

In fact, crying is thought to serve a number of important physiological functions. Having the courage to express your emotions in public should be considered a sign of strength, not weakness.

Don't misunderstand me.

If everyone starts crying whenever things don't go their way, then our society is going to turn into one huge preschool.

However, it would be nice for men to stop repressing and start expressing.

Louie mentions that as a child he was trained to view tears as a sign of weakness. This almost is as bad as the Puritans teaching their children that nocturnal emissions meant they were doomed to hell.

Crying is a natural human response to things that are physically or emotionally painful. Forcing men to suppress their tears causes them to deny the pain they're feeling.

If males dealt with their feelings more openly, then they would respond more appropriately when females cry. Most males just try to do anything they can to make the crying stop.

This causes a number of problems and leaves the guy open for prime manipulation.

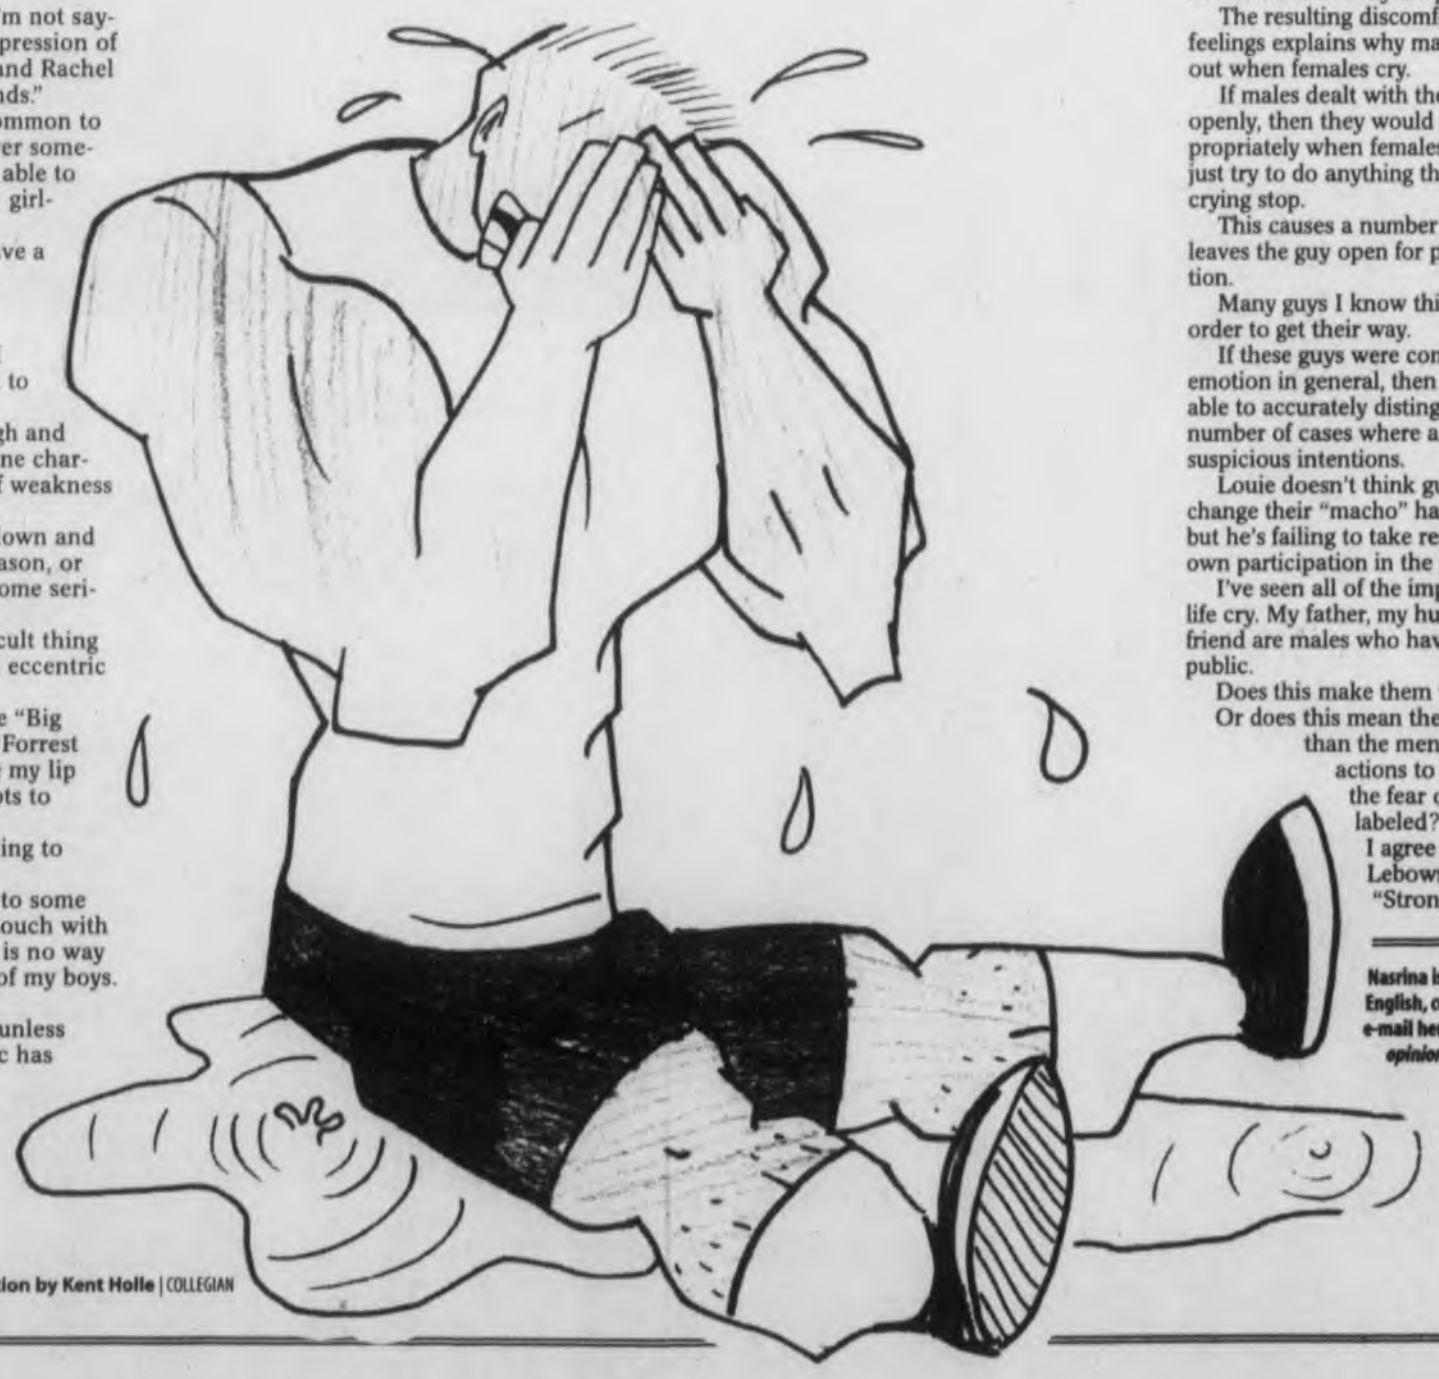
If these guys were comfortable with emotion in general, then they would be able to accurately distinguish the minute number of cases where a woman cries with suspicious intentions.

Louie doesn't think guys are going to change their "macho" habits any time soon, but he's failing to take responsibility for his own participation in the problem.



I've seen all of the important men in my life cry. My father, my husband and my best friend are males who have shed tears in public.

Does this make them weak?

Or does this mean they are stronger than the men who allow their actions to be controlled by the fear of being judged or labeled?

I agree with the Big Lebowski when he says "Strong men also cry."

Deal with it

Students should accept reasons for high tuition

SCOTT SEEL

I remember when there was a bathroom in Eisenhower Hall where a sign was affixed to the paper towel dispenser that stated the following:

"Due to budget restraints, this dispenser will no longer be stocked. We apologize for the inconvenience."

Yup, it's all about the Benjamins.

And right now, the state of Kansas and its universities are seeing their supply of Benjamins diminish drastically.

As a result, so are K-State students, along with the students of other regent institutions.

President Jon Wefald, Student Body President John O'Hara, Provost James Coffman, Vice President of Institutional Advancement Bob Krause and Vice President for Administration and Finance Tom Rawson all publicly have spoken out against the Governor's budget proposal, and rightfully so.

However, I feel that something needs to be pointed out.

While this budget proposal may not be feasible, I feel the context in which this budget had to be drafted has been ignored.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius has left some things to be desired as governor, but one must consider the economic situation in which she has found herself.

And Kansas is not alone.

All around the country, states have seen record deficits and the federal government is in the midst of the largest deficit in history.

What's my point?

These things need to be considered when critically evaluating the governor's budget.

Is this budget a futile attempt to solve a problem?

Maybe, but I think it is more likely a desperate and honest attempt to rectify a dire situation in an important area of our state.

There are some elements of the budget proposal with which I disagree.

Programs such as the extension office and agricultural endeavors, which do not receive tuition revenue, will be adversely affected by the budget alterations.

While everyone has a right to be angry about this and voice his opinion accordingly, before doing so I urge you to consider the state's situation.

The state of Kansas is no different than any other business.

It has to make the money work.

When money is tight, you have to save money somewhere, so the state is making cuts.

This has many ramifications in our daily life.

In the end, what most students and residents are going to care about is the tuition.

It is a sad day when the administration is attempting to quell rampant pessimism by promising to attempt to keep tuition hikes under the 20 percent plateau.

A sad day, but it is the reality.

And it is not their fault.

Like they always say, excrement flows downhill.

The governor has to solve the state's financial situation, so she is forced to make cuts in all state institutions, not just K-State and not just universities.

Subsequently, the university has to make accommodations to pay the bills.

Us.

So suck it up and deal with it.

All the complaining to staff, faculty, administration and the governor isn't going to get you anywhere.

Do you honestly believe they are doing these things for fun?

Wefald does not benefit from a higher tuition rate.

Sebelius is not sitting back in her chair, rubbing her hands together diabolically, knowing that thousands of college students can't buy as much beer this year because of higher tuition.

These are just the signs of the times.

If you want to change things, your only real choice is to elect legislators who will attempt to balance the budget, and even that is a shot in the dark.

It is all about the Benjamins, but unfortunately they don't grow on trees.

PERSPECTIVES

Court right to deem sex-offender law illegal

Staff Editorial
IOWA STATE DAILY (IOWA STATE U.)

AMES, Iowa - We think of them as monsters and find their crimes reprehensible, but one fact still remains – sex offenders are people, too.

We may not want to claim them, but after paying their debt to society, sex offenders deserve the rights of life and property, and to live that life on the property of their choice.

And so sang the Iowa Supreme Court in its Feb. 9 decision to strike down Iowa's law prohibiting sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools and other child care facilities.

The court sided in favor of the Iowa Civil Liberties Union, which argued the restriction banished sex offenders – new and formerly convicted – effectively from living in some towns.

The court also found the law unconstitutional because of its retroactive nature, since it applied to previously released offenders who already were living in the "no sex offender here zone."

In areas where sex offenders could live, concerns were raised about sex offender ghettos.

Imagine all the released sex offenders living in an apartment complex together, sitting around playing poker and talking about their previous deviant activities.

It's scary, especially for anyone stuck living in that building or particular sector of town, especially if they have children.

Laws banning offenders from certain areas also make dangerous assumptions, such that sex offenders stay in one place.

Of course, it seems hazardous to have a former offender live next door to a schoolyard where he or she can look outside the window to the image of children frolicking about at recess.

But will any specific number of feet prevent children from suffering at the hands of a sexual deviant, especially considering most are assaulted by people they know?

Plaintiff lawyers argued no.

"There is no evidence that sex offenders reoffend by living within any magic number of feet from a school," wrote attorney Philip Mears in his arguments to the Iowa Supreme Court.

In reality, if a former sex offender wants to find a victim, it is doubtful any number of feet will prevent him or her.

With the recidivist nature of sexual crimes and its close link to pedophilia, protecting children seems like a task for a superhero.

However, it is a task the government needs to address. This law may be unconstitutional, but its effort to protect children is commendable.

It is the government's job to protect its citizens, and children are the most helpless of us all.

Whether it's more therapy, longer sentences or the extreme of chemical castration for repeat offenders, something must be done – as long as it withstands constitutional scrutiny.

K-State women win in double overtime Sunday

Down by as many as 15, key players lead late scoring run to win against Missouri

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a heavyweight bout that needed more than the 40 minutes of regulation to be decided.

The No. 8 women's basketball team (21-3, 12-1) needed two overtimes to put away the Missouri Tigers (13-11, 4-9) who had only won one conference game in the Hearnes Center.

But in the end, the late bloomers bloomed even later Sunday, leading the Wildcats to a 93-90 victory.

Down by as many as 15 with about 10 minutes to go, the Wildcats began a run to finish off the Tigers.

K-State had one more opportunity in the form of a Chelsea Domenico 3-point attempt, which missed and ended regulation in a tie.

It was the first time in more than two years K-State had played an overtime period. It was Missouri's first ever against a ranked opponent.

Forward Kendra Wecker led all scorers with 26 points. Nicole Ohlde scored 23, Megan Mahoney had 20 and Laurie Koehn chipped in 19 as the Cats shot 55 percent from the field in the game including 9-of-12 in the overtime periods.

After a mishap at morning shootaround, freshman guard Claire Coggins was in uniform but not available due to a wrist injury sustained earlier in the day.

Evan Unrau led the Tigers with a career-high 40 points, 20 of which came in the first half, and 15 rebounds. It was the most points scored in a Big 12 conference game this season.

Unrau fouled out of the game with 1.9 seconds to go in the second overtime, and everyone in the stands and both the K-State and Missouri benches showed appreciation for her game giving Unrau a standing ovation.

With Texas' 49-62 loss to Texas Tech Sunday, K-State is now alone atop the Big 12 standings with pending matchups against both the Texas Longhorns and Texas Tech Red Raiders to go in the season.

Tickets are still available for Wednesday night's game against Iowa State. Tipoff is set for 7 p.m., and tickets can be attained by calling (800) 221-CATS.

Wildcats struggle again

Cats shoot 41 percent; Buffaloes dominate boards

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's bid to climb in the Big 12 Conference standings took a hit Saturday, when the team lost to Colorado, 72-62.

The Wildcats (12-11, 4-8) struggled offensively and were dominated on the boards by the Buffaloes (15-8, 7-5) in the loss.

"It was a step back in the wrong direction," senior guard Tim Ellis said.

The Wildcats shot just 41 percent, shooting 20-of-49 from the floor and were outrebounded 40-31.

"We just never got into a rhythm or flow, and we couldn't rebound the basketball," Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

Colorado was led by senior guard Michel Morandais, who scored 21 points. Junior center David Harrison also registered his 23rd career double-double, scoring 13 points and pulling in 10 rebounds against the Wildcats.

"Harrison is such a presence, and Morandais is very difficult to guard," Wooldridge said.

Defensively, the Buffaloes shut down Ellis with its man-to-man defense, allowing Ellis only 16 points on 5-of-10 shooting from the field. Ellis had been averaging 20.8 points a game the last five games, connecting on 66 percent of his shots.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Marques Hayden and Colorado's Chris Copeland fight for a rebound during the second half of Saturday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. Colorado defeated K-State, 72-62.

"They played good defense. They tightened up a little more than the first game," Ellis said.

At one point, K-State hit only one field goal in a 15-minute stretch and was held to 36 percent shooting in the second half.

The Wildcats' offense also suffered with senior guard Jarrett Hart hampered by a hip injury. Hart was 2-of-8 from the field with five points.

"Hart not having a great shooting night is very fortunate for us," Harrison said. "He is one of the best shooters in the league."

Despite the loss, junior forward Jeremiah Massey scored 23 points and grabbed 11 rebounds for his seventh double-double of the season.

"He is tough and hard-nosed. He is quick with the ball, and he knows how to post up," Colorado coach Ricardo Patton said.

Massey said the game came down to rebounds.

"If we stop them from rebounding, we win the game," Massey said. "We just didn't do what we had to do."

Wildcat offense struggles in loss, fails to score consistently

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Jeremiah Massey fights for a rebound with Colorado's David Harrison during the Wildcats' loss Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. While Massey led all scorers with 23 points, K-State struggled offensively, being held to one field goal during a 15-minute stretch in the loss.

Ellis foul trouble, Hart's hip injury factors in weak offense

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the aftermath of Saturday's 72-62 loss to Colorado at Bramlage Coliseum, fingers could have been pointed in several directions as to why the Wildcats lost.

Colorado snagged 20 offensive rebounds, and Colorado senior guard Michel Morandais scored 21 points.

"There are two things about this game that stick out," Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"One is that I thought rebounding was a huge problem. Twenty offensive rebounds is a gigantic problem. The other problem was the playmaking of Morandais."

But there was more to the story.

The Wildcat offense failed to score consistently throughout the game, producing the lowest-scoring output at home since a Jan. 17, 57-56 loss to Oklahoma State.

"We never got into a rhythm, and we never got into a flow," Wooldridge said.

After taking a 25-22 lead with 8:21 remaining in the first half, the Wildcat offense went cold and failed to convert a field goal until the 19:12 mark in the second half.

The long stretch without a field goal allowed the Buffaloes to take a 38-30 lead into halftime – a lead they would never relinquish.

Colorado junior center David Harrison did not think the drought was due to poor Wildcat shot selection.

"They took good shots, and they weren't falling," Harrison said. "It happens."

The Wildcats shot just 40.8 percent for the game, as multiple factors played into the Wildcats' offensive inefficiency.

Senior guard Tim Ellis was forced to play just 26 of the game's 40 minutes as he battled foul trouble for most of the contest.

Though scoring 16 points, Ellis was regulated to the bench for many stretches and scored half of his points in the final 1:38 when the game was all but out of reach for the Wildcats.

K-State also was forced to play with one of its veteran leaders far from 100 percent healthy.

Senior guard Jarrett Hart – who is the Wildcats' third-leading scorer with 11 points per game – was affected by an injury to his hip sustained in the Feb. 18 win at Nebraska.

Hart was hesitant to take open looks and drive to the basket, and he finished the game with five points on just 2-of-8 shooting.

Wooldridge was somewhat surprised Hart was able to play at all.

"We didn't know about him the last couple of days, and we really didn't anticipate him playing," Wooldridge said.

Providing a bright spot for the K-State offense was junior forward Jeremiah Massey.

Massey earned his seventh double-double of the season with 23 points and 11 rebounds.

"He is tough and hard-nosed," Patton said. "He's quick with the ball, and he knows how to post up."

With Ellis' foul trouble and Hart's injury, many excuses could have been made for the Wildcats' poor offensive game, but Ellis has a simple theory.

"It could have been an off-night, they played extremely good defense," Ellis said. "But, I think it could have been an off-night for some people."

NASCAR | Kenseth wins Subway 400 Sunday

Matt Kenseth picked the best way possible to silence his critics: dominating a race and using a thrilling finish to get back to Victory Lane.

Kenseth

Considered boring in both personality and the way he relied on consistency over wins to earn NASCAR's top title last season, Kenseth shed the image Sunday by nipping rookie Kasey Kahne at the finish line of North Carolina Speedway to win the Subway 400.

It was Kenseth's first victory in nearly a year. Although he led the point standings for a record 33 straight weeks, he had just one victory and only led 354 laps all season.

His method of collecting a series-best 25 top-10s was considered so drama-free, NASCAR changed the points system this year to prevent a repeat.

MLB | Otis Nixon charged with fondling woman

Former major league outfielder Otis Nixon was arrested and charged with fondling a woman at his home.

Nixon

Nixon was arrested Friday evening and charged with misdemeanor sexual battery, DeKalb County Police Lt. Myron Logan said Sunday. Nixon was later released on $1,000 bond.

The woman left a gathering at Nixon's home Friday afternoon and told police she had been inappropriately touched by Nixon, Logan said.

Nixon, 45, also was arrested Jan. 8 for allegedly threatening his bodyguard, Kevin Brown, with a knife at a hotel.

The speedy Nixon played for nine teams during a 17-year major league career from 1983-99. He stole 620 bases, 17th on the career list, and batted .270.

NFL | Crouch considers 3rd try at playing in NFL

Heisman Trophy winner Eric Crouch says he would like a third try at playing in the NFL, this time as a defensive back.

Crouch

"It's a position I played in high school," Crouch, who won the Heisman Trophy in 2001 as a quarterback for Nebraska, said Saturday.

Crouch said he's talking with Green Bay about a possible return. If things don't work out with the Packers, he said he would be interested in playing for other teams.

Crouch was taken in the third round of the 2001 draft by the St. Louis Rams, who tried to convert him into a receiver. He quit during training camp because of injuries.

The Packers picked up Crouch last April and gave him a shot at quarterback and playing special teams. But Crouch quit before the regular season began and said he was ready to retire from football.

Take detour, avoid 'Mooseport'

Steer clear of bad actor, script

"Welcome to Mooseport"

★☆☆☆☆

Movie review by Christopher Harrop

The political grudge match between Gene Hackman and Ray Romano in "Welcome to Mooseport" is nothing compared to the way so many decent actors get dragged through the mud, suffering from a weak script and Romano's downright inability to act.

"Mooseport" is Romano's live-action film debut. He tackles the daunting task of portraying the same dumb schlub that you see on "Everybody Loves Raymond," only this time, Romano is a local handyman named Handy.

Handy is a man who has never worked up the nerve to propose to his girlfriend of six years, Sally (Maura Tierney). If the filmmakers got one thing right, it was showing the quaintness and complacency of Handy.

Then comes trouble.

The city of Mooseport is the summer home of former President Monroe "Eagle" Cole (Hackman). Following a nasty divorce from the former first lady (Christine Baranski), Cole decides to settle in Mooseport.

When the town's longtime mayor keels over, the Mooseport elders beseech the former president to run for the vacant office. All is well, until Handy decides to step into the political arena to keep Cole's campaign honest.

Of course, this film never could have been about just a political campaign. Handy and Cole soon begin to squabble over the affections of Handy's girlfriend.

At the same time, Cole staffer Grace Sutherland (Oscar nominee Marcia Gay Harden) secretly vies for the former president's affections as the two candidates fight for their campaigns to the bitter end.

While you haven't seen this particular premise before, you already know every plot move and piece of dialogue. "Mooseport" brings nothing new to the table, save for some of the quirky locals.

One never really realizes how many naked joggers and potty-mouthed elderly women live in picturesque little towns until "Mooseport."

While the writing is horrific, some performances are worth noting.

While Romano's on-screen charisma is nonexistent and brings down everyone around him, Hackman turns in a decent portrayal of the former president. While this is a typecast role for Hackman, he works with it and lets loose more than usual.

The smaller roles shine through in "Mooseport."

Every moment that Marcia Gay Harden shares the screen with Hackman is nothing short of delightful. The fiery performance of Christine Baranski as former first lady Charlotte Cole also brings a smile.

When one of the leads in a grudge match film doesn't work, the film falls apart. While brief moments of hilarity ensue with smaller characters, "Welcome to Mooseport" is a lesson in bad filmmaking.

"Feels Like Home"

★★★★☆

Album review by Jessica Grant

Norah Jones has done it again. The genre-bending vocal phenomenon has managed to create a new album that proves she is definitely worthy of ruling the music charts.

"Feels Like Home" is the sophomore album from the young vocalist from Grapevine, Texas/New York City. After her sweep of the 2003 Grammys for her album "Come Away with Me," Jones's newest album has been one of the most highly anticipated releases of 2004. "Feels Like Home" does not disappoint and serves as a reminder of why Jones is so appealing.

The key to Jones's success lies in her accessibility. Jones has managed to create a sound that appeals to almost everyone. And much of her appeal lies in her indescribability as a musician.

Duke Ellington, the king of diversity, was fond of saying someone was "beyond category" when their abilities surpassed the common labels applied to artists.

The phrase is the perfect fit for a woman who flawlessly blurs the lines between folk, blues, pop, jazz, bluegrass, gospel and rhythm and blues.

Blue Note Records took a risk when they initially signed this unusual vocalist. Some critics argue Jones is not jazzy enough to be on Blue Note.

However, Jones has proved she will not abandon her jazz roots, though she has no problem experimenting with her sound.

The first song on "Feels Like Home" is also the first single: "Sunrise," a soft song one would expect to hear in the waiting room of a dentist's office.

The song has a cooing chorus and gentle piano, but is kept upbeat by the plucking of a banjolin.

"In the Morning" is a sultry, bluesy number that is a true standout. Jones' fluid vocals blend gorgeously with Daru Oda's outstanding backing vocals to create the perfect complement to the rich swagger of the electric piano.

The only visible problem with this album is the lyrical content. Jones sings about love on most of her songs.

For the average artist this would come off as redundant and maudlin, but Norah Jones is simply too good to let this happen.

Norah Jones has proven she is worthy of the hype that surrounded her first album.

Expect to see "Feels Like Home" finding a home for itself in the music charts, as it deserves.

Consider level of severity when choosing hangover remedy

SETH BISHOP

Tomorrow we celebrate Mardi Gras – an important date on most college students' calendars, second only to spring break yet still not recognized by the administration.

Our degree is only part of our education. Contacts made while at school can be quite beneficial in the post-college business world.

While in Aggieville, you might be elbow to elbow with your future tax accountant. It is vital you be able to remember his/her name and inspire confidence and professionalism, in spite of that very public indiscretion outside Rusty's.

Recovery starts with identification. It is important to identify your hangover level and its appropriate remedy in an attempt to have you productive as quickly as possible.

ONE-STAR HANGOVER

No pain. You look OK, but you have the mental capacity of a staple gun. The coffee you're chugging only increases your rumbling gut, currently tossing around the 3 a.m. Waffle House fruity pancake.

Remedy: Quit the coffee and move to apple juice and dry toast.

TWO-STAR HANGOVER

Slight headache. Stomach in knots. Definitely not productive. Perfume makes you gag; it reminds you of the flavored schnapps shots your alcoholic roommates forced you to drink. You've had four cups of coffee, a gallon of water, three iced teas and a Diet Coke – yet you haven't peed once.

Remedy: Water. Only water. And your ibuprofen of choice.

THREE-STAR HANGOVER

Your head is throbbing. Everyday activities, even at half speed, still cause disorientation. You managed to dress yourself, but you only shaved one side of your face.

Remedy: Rub a cut lime on your forehead, it removes the throbbing.

Safety risk – lime juice in the eyes presents an entirely new health condition.

FOUR-STAR HANGOVER

You have a second heartbeat in your head. Vodka vapor is seeping out of your pores and increases your dizziness. Your body has lost the ability to produce saliva.

Remedy: "Hair of the dog that bit you" – four ounces of whatever you were drinking last night. Slightly less painful, eight ounces of tomato juice.

Track and field team finishes 1st in 10 events in Big 12 Indoor Championships; conference meet begins Friday in Nebraska

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The track and field team competed in its final tune-up before the Big 12 Indoor Championships Saturday at the KSU Open in Ahearn Field House.

The team had first-place finishes in 10 events and added to its number of automatic qualifiers for the NCAA Indoor Championships.

"I thought we did a number of really positive things," Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

One positive came from senior Rebekah Green in the women's shot put. Green had a winning throw of 56 feet 4 inches, good enough to automatically qualify for the national meet.

"It's huge because she'll have a good shot of winning at the conference meet if she throws that good," Rovelto said. "That would be a huge boost for the team."

The men throwers also had a big day, led by junior Coby Cost's first-place finish in the weight throw. The Wildcats swept the event, with sophomore Ryan Creadick finishing second, followed by junior Tarl Vetter and senior Adam Walker in third and fourth, respectively.

"As a team, Coach is pleased with our performance," Cost said, whose winning toss measured 65 feet 8.75 inches.

"If we throw like we did this week, we'll have a good performance at the Big 12 meet. If we can get four in the top five again, that would be huge."

Also sweeping their events were the men high jumpers. Sophomore Kyle Lancaster, senior Mike Kizinkewich and freshman Wojciech Borysiewicz went one, two and three in the event, with Lancaster clearing a winning height of 7 feet 1.75 inches.

"If they jump like that at the conference meet, it will be pretty significant for us," Rovelto said.

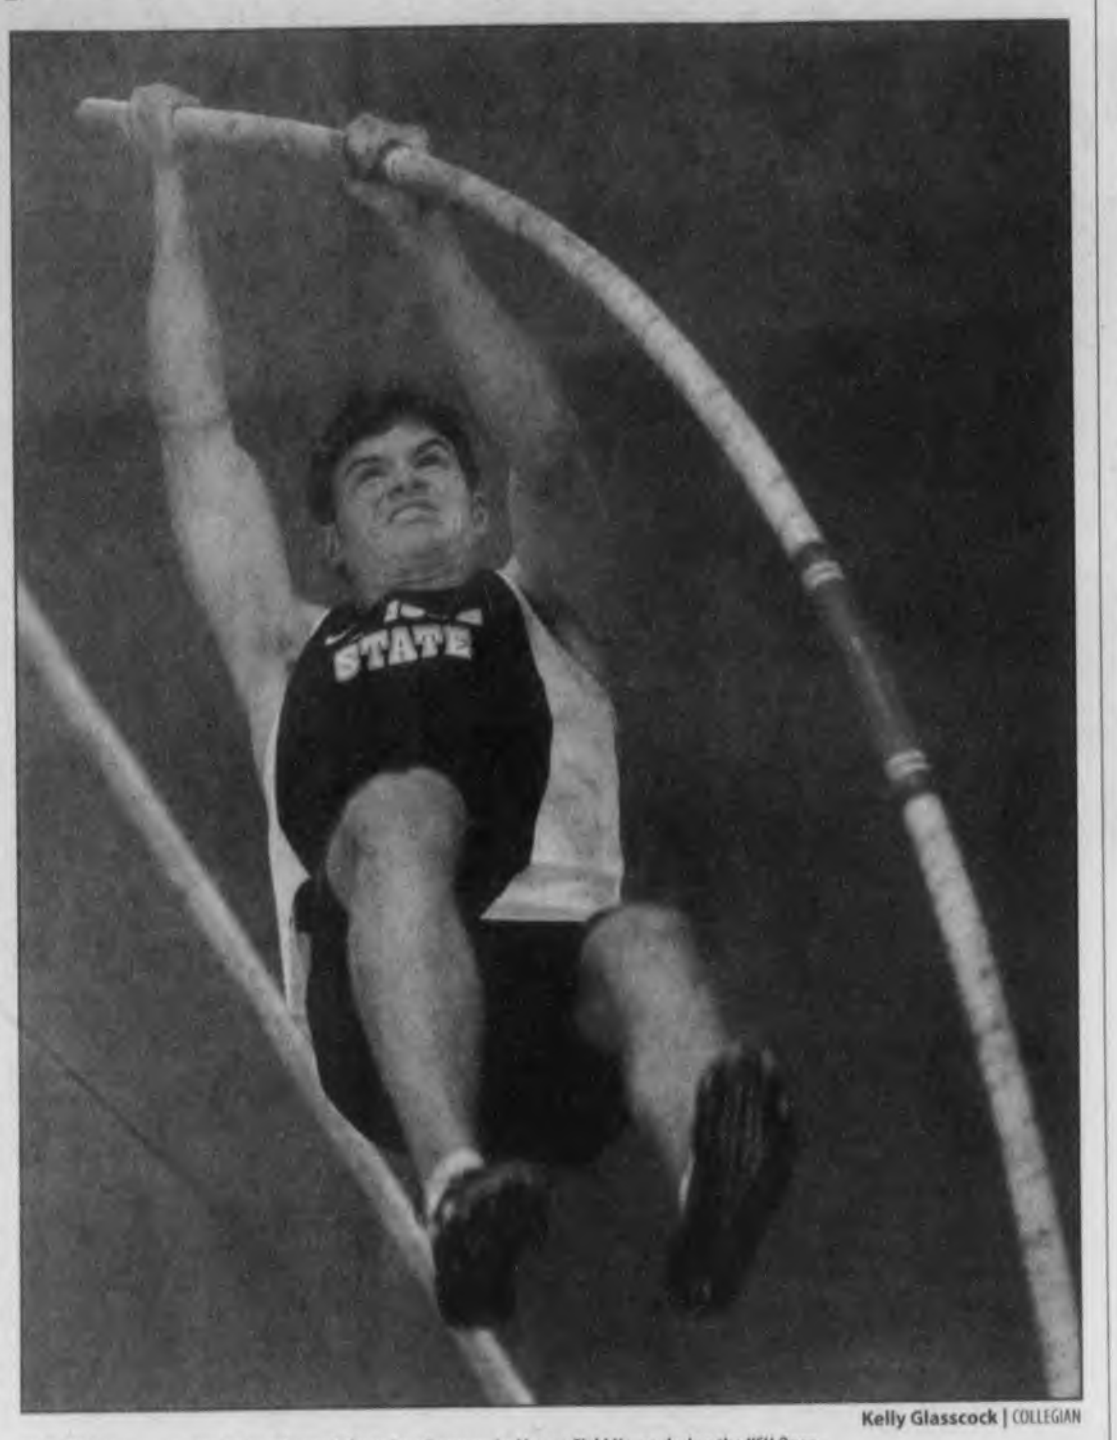
The women rounded out their winners with freshman Monique Coleman in the 200-meter, junior Berenice Meza in the 600-yard, freshman Lisi Maurer in the 60-meter hurdles, sophomore Janelle Wright in high jump and junior Chaytan Hill in long jump.



Now the team's focus is squarely on the conference meet, which begins Friday in Lincoln, Neb.

Assistant coach Steve Fritz will be preparing his throwers for another strong performance against the conference's best.

"With only a week left, there's nothing we can do physically," he said. "They just need to duplicate what they did this week, next week."

For Cost and the rest of the Wildcats, the last week of preparation begins for the team's biggest meet of the season.

"We'll be working on the little things and not change too much so we can go big next week," he said.

Baseball team wins 2 of 3

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The baseball team's trip to Allen County Community College ended on a sour note Sunday as the team suffered a 12-11 loss to Western Illinois.

The loss also ended the Cat's chances for their first sweep in the young season. On Saturday, K-State handed Western Illinois a 9-5 loss and followed it up with a walk-off 9-8 win in the nightcap.

In what was originally scheduled to be a home series against the Leathernecks, inclement playing conditions moved the match to Iola, Kan.

The change didn't seem to faze the Cats on Saturday.

Terry Blunt and Chris Carlson led the offensive attack for K-State. Blunt chipped in with three hits while Carlson blasted a grand slam to lead the team with four RBI.

Game two saw the Cats jump out to a 4-1 lead on the pitching of Carlos Torres, who pitched seven innings and gave up only six hits.

The bullpen could not maintain Torres' pace, giving up seven runs in 1.1 innings and giving Western Illinois an 8-6 lead going into the bottom of the ninth.

K-State tied it at eight with three straight singles and a fielder's choice.

With the bases loaded and one out, Steve Murphy hit a fly ball to left that allowed Blunt to score from third and gave the Cats a win.

Carlson continued his offensive barrage on Sunday, belting two of the Cats five homers of the afternoon. It was the first time in two years that K-State hit five home runs in a single game.

A pair of back to back homers from Carlson and Zac Saunders in the first inning propelled the Cats to 4-3 lead.

The other home run from Carlson followed a two-run shot by Murphy to put the Cats up 7-6 after three innings of play.

Despite the offensive attack, K-State couldn't answer the Leathernecks.

"We certainly had our opportunities, Sunday," Coach Brad Hill said. "Our guys battled back several times, but we just could not put up a zero defensively after scoring some runs."

Now 3-3 on the season, the Cats will travel to Monroe, La., this weekend for the University of Louisiana-Monroe Classic. The tournament will feature a matchup between K-State and Louisiana-Monroe at 6:30 p.m. Friday.

MEN'S BASKETBALL | KSU loses to Colorado at home Saturday

In the first half, K-State took the lead several different times, looking as if they might run away with the game, but could never build the lead to more than three points thanks to timely 3-point shooting by the Buffaloes. Colorado hit six 3-pointers to stay with the Wildcats.

"They had too much offense in the first half," Wooldridge said.

Senior forward Blair Wilson, freshman guard Marcus Hall and Morandais each had two 3-point shots in the the first half. The Buffaloes took the lead for good on Morandais' second 3-pointer with 7:01 left in the first half.

The loss to Colorado was the first the Wildcats have suffered at home since losing to Kansas Jan. 28 and only the third loss at Bramlage Coliseum this season. It was also the first time the Buffaloes swept the season series with K-State in four years.

"I thought Colorado played very well. They are very athletic," Wooldridge said.

NADER | Independent joins race

who personally urged Nader not to run, called the decision "unfortunate."

"You know, he's had a whole distinguished career, fighting for working families, and I would hate to see part of his legacy being that he got us eight years of George Bush," McAuliffe said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico minced no words. "It's a total act of ego," he said.

Vermont Rep. Bernie Sanders, the only independent in the House and a longtime Nader friend, called Nader's decision "counterproductive." Even the Green Party, whose banner Nader carried four years ago, chose to focus on its own priorities.

"Our midterm goal is the creation of a multiparty political system and the participation of a strong Green Party in that system," said Ben Manski, the party's co-chairman.

But Nader dismissed his critics among "the liberal intelligentsia," and called the spoiler moniker "contemptuous."

"It shows how hostage they are to the antiquated electoral system and how unwilling they are to oppose and change it," he said in an interview with the Associated Press.

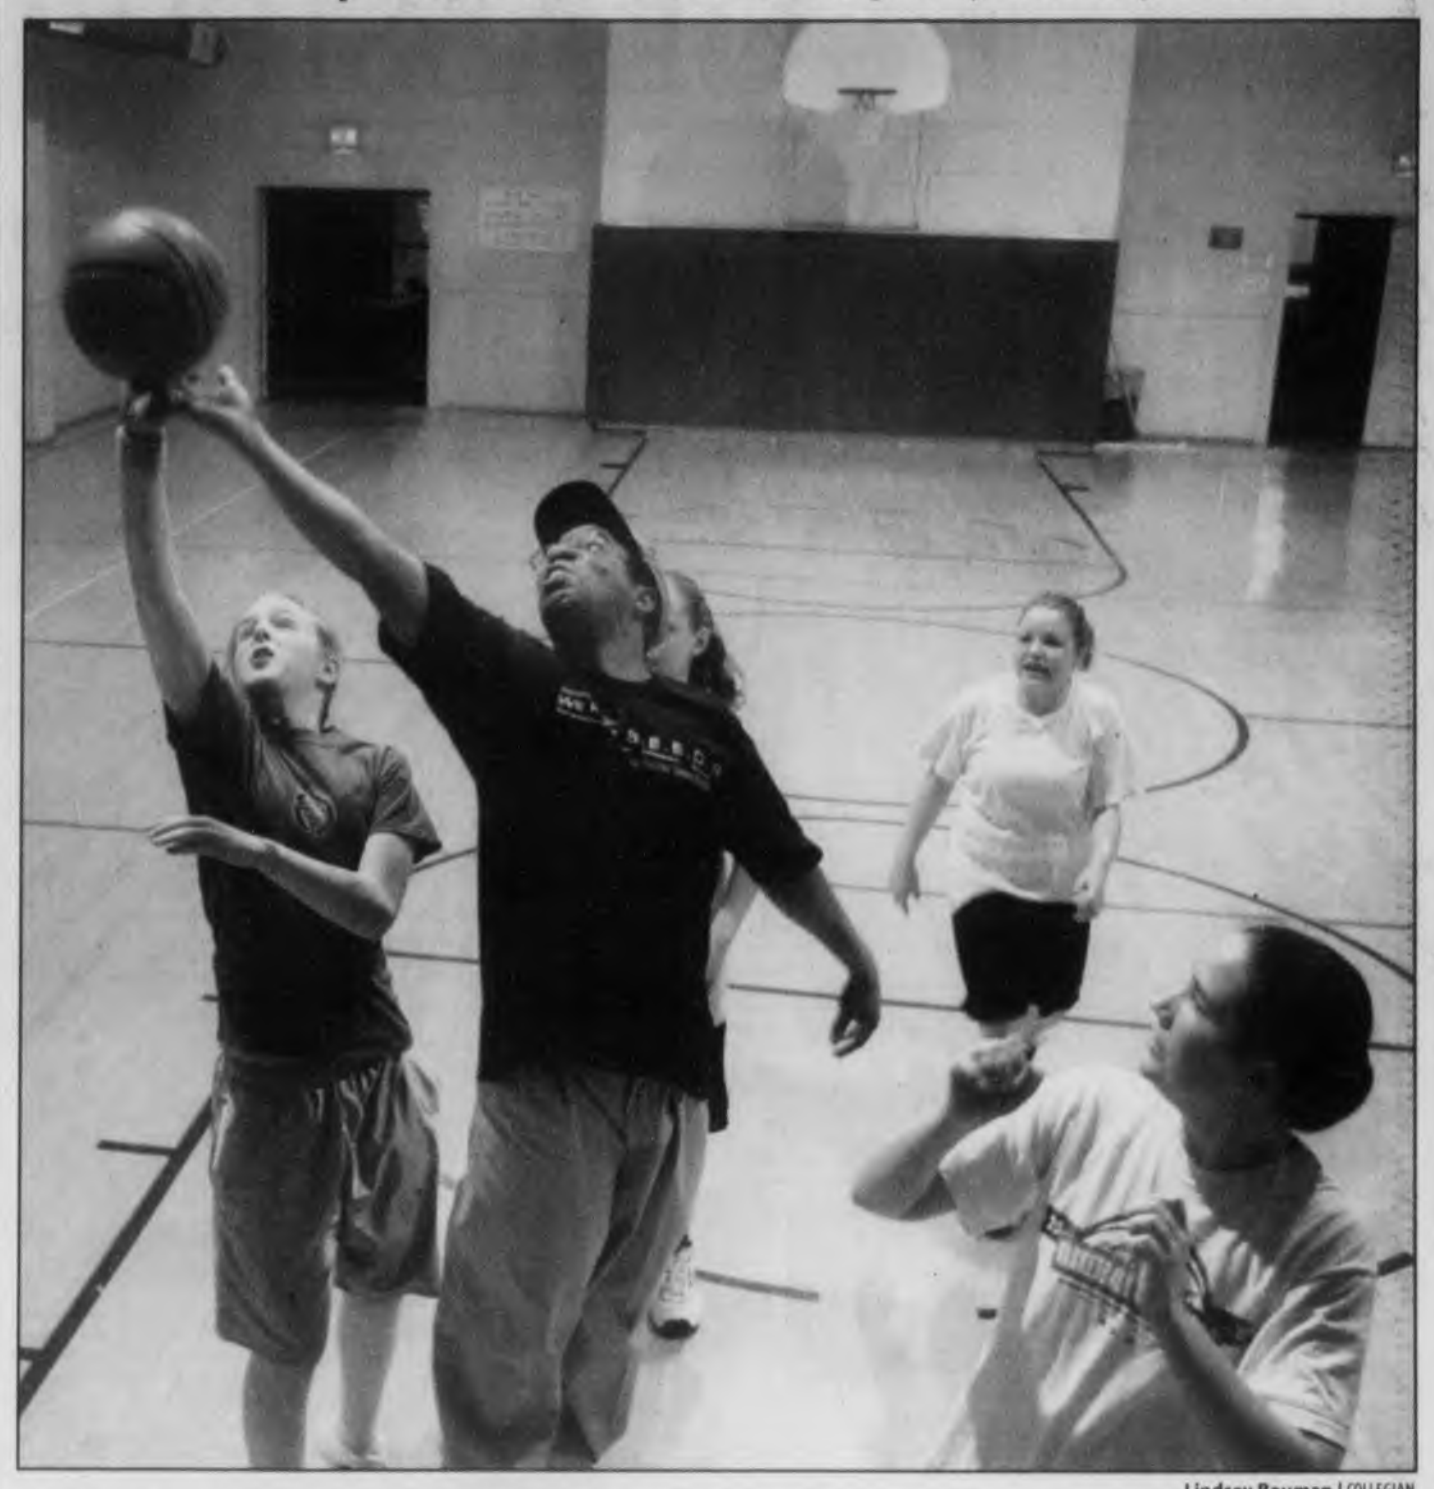
"I would urge them to calm down, start reflecting, be tolerant of democracy and freedom and watch events unfold since we're all on the same page of wanting to retire our supremely elected president, George W. Bush."

Nader predicted he would get more net votes from conservatives and liberal Republicans dissatisfied with Bush's record than from registered Democrats.

Democratic officials on Sunday claimed Nader has promised not to criticize the Democratic nominee but, rather, focus his ammunition on the Bush administration. Nader acknowledged the pledge but said it does not mean he will refrain from criticizing Democrats if they attack him. "I'm not going to avoid responding," he told the AP.

Nader, who scheduled a news conference Monday to discuss his issues, said he plans to begin campaigning this week on Bush's home turf of Texas, where he will focus on Bush's record.

As the Green Party's nominee in 2000, Nader appeared on the ballot in 43 states and Washington, D.C., garnering nearly 3 percent of the vote. But in Florida and New Hampshire, Bush won such narrow victories that had Gore received the bulk of Nader's votes in either state, the Democrat would have won the general election.



Nader's decision not to seek the Green Party's nomination has raised doubts that he can get on many state ballots without a party organization or major financial resources.

An independent needs about 700,000 signatures to get on the ballot in all 50 states, a prospect that Nader likened to "climbing a cliff with a slippery slope."

Nader said his exploratory committee had raised about $150,000 in the past five months. He said he is confident he can raise more than the $8 million he received last time using the same Internet fundraising strategies that former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean employed before dropping out of the race.

Nader will rely on small contributions and refuse money from corporations and political action committees.

rich and famous anytime soon, he said he enjoys working at Media Relations now.

"I never saw myself in the field of public relations, but when I get to promote something that I believe so much in, you can't beat that," he said.

Tippin said he thrives in the K-State community partly because of its smaller atmosphere.

"K-State is big, but it's also small because of the tight-knit community feeling," he said.

Working within that tight-knit community never brings a dull day for him either.

"No two days are ever alike. I could be handling a crisis situation one day and then advising a student the next," he said.

Hall said she believes Tippin does a thorough job in taking time for others.

Tippin is involved with a variety of groups on campus including the Black Student Union and Black Faculty Staff Alliance, as well as involvement within the community coaching youth basketball and being on the Board of Directors for Wonder Workshop.

However, Tippin finds his involvement in such organizations to be that of a privilege.

"I am honored to be working with some of the best and the brightest students on campus," he said.

It isn't always easy being so demanded, especially as a minority within the K-State community.

"It is more challenging because there are not as many black people on campus, and it leaves more responsibility for certain roles," he said.

However, with any position Tippin takes on, he stays humble – in or out of the limelight.

"She's going against the odds," Rolfe said. "She's a single mom, and she's still determined to be a leader."

Dana Watts, program advisor for the Union Program Council, said Musawwir is able to bring her own background into her work as multicultural chair.

"She brings a different perspective – something diverse," Watts said.

Musawwir also brings her leadership into her personal life.

She has a 2-year-old daughter, Na'imah, and has dedicated most of her free time to family – especially her younger sister, whom she has looked after since their mother was killed while she was in high school.

It's all of these things that have allowed her to become the leader that she is today.

"I'm definitely proud to be an African-American woman, proud to be an African-American and proud to be a single parent," she said. "I'm proud to be a student at Kansas State University."

Marines enter Haiti to guard embassy

By Michael Norton
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti – Fifty U.S. Marines streamed into the capital Monday to protect the U.S. Embassy and its staff, while government loyalists set flaming barricades to block the road from rebels threatening to move on Port-au-Prince.

The United States made last-ditch efforts at finding a political solution. As an opposition coalition was on the brink of rejecting a U.S.-backed peace plan on the grounds that it did not call for President Jean-Bertrand Aristide to step down, Secretary of State Colin Powell phoned opposition politicians and asked them to delay responding formally to the plan for 24 hours.

Evans Paul, a leading opponent who once was allied with Aristide, said the coalition agreed the extra time "will perhaps give Mr. Powell a little more time to consider his position ... and give us the assurances we need" on Aristide's departure.

With rebels hoping to seize the capital by Sunday, Cabinet ministers were asking friends for places to hide, senior government sources said. The rebels seized Haiti's second-largest city, Cap-Haitien, with little resistance Sunday and attacked two police stations outside Port-au-Prince.

Proposal would drop students who miss 1st day of class

Faculty Senate debates policy that would decrease wait lists

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sleeping in on the first day of classes might not be an option anymore.

A new proposal, still in debate in the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee, may change the time period in which a student automatically can be dropped from a class they are not attending.

The current policy states that instructors can drop a student from a class after one week of absence at he beginning of the semester with no effort to contact that instructor. The proposal is to move that time period up to one day.

No decisions have been made yet regarding the proposal, David Pacey, member of the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee, said.

"It's an attempt to get students who are waitlisted into the class," he said. "We want to move that process along."

The proposal could be voted on as soon as the next Faculty Senate meeting, Pacey said.

The Academic Affairs Committee will have to pass the proposal for it to be moved to Faculty Senate where it will be voted on again.

"It's still a long way from full Senate approval," he said.

The change in policy has been discussed at length and has been reworded several times, Fred Fairchild, member of the Academic Affairs Committee, said.

"We want to make sure it fits its intent and purpose," he said. "It's not ready to be voted on yet."

Melissa Ebert, junior in mass communications, hangs up the phone after calling a K-State alumnus Sunday night at the KSU Foundation Center. Ebert worked with other K-State students and volunteers to help raise money for higher education. In 2003, Telefund raised $1,403,303 and set a goal on $1,425,250 this year.

Telefund approaches goal in final week

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The bank of 86 telephones and headsets, the Powercat banners lining the walls and the plethora of prizes can distract you from the Snickers bar flying at your head.

Welcome to Telefund.

The KSU Foundation Telefund reached $1 million in pledges Sunday night, and the goal of $1,425,250 remains within reach with three nights of calling remaining.

The total going into tonight stands at $1,108,575.

The annual event connects student volunteers with alumni via calling sessions at the Foundation Center, where students call alumni to solicit donations.

"The students serve as ambassadors, and that's just a wonderful thing," said Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving at the Foundation.

The money is given directly to the college from which the alumnus graduated, or the alumnus can choose which of the more than 500 Foundation accounts he or she wants to donate to.

The students are never made to feel like telemarketers, Dowell said, because of the connections they can make with alumni.

"Students get into conversations and get career advice and hear stories from graduates," he said.

Some have found summer jobs through their contact with alumni, he said.

Rob Pettay, advising coordinator in the Department of Kinesiology, was one of the faculty coaches Sunday night. He said he enjoys seeing students overcome their reservations throughout the night.

"Most really enjoy it," Pettay said. "Some are really hesitant at first, but most begin to like it after their first few phone calls."

Ninety percent of Telefund donations from this week will go toward student scholarships, Alison Wheatley, assistant dean of the college, said.

The donations, though, begin much earlier.

All students who work Telefund are entered to win a Nissan Xterra. Other grand prizes include scholarships, a vacation, and tickets to Country Stampede.

But no one leaves empty-handed.

Mel Ebert, junior in public relations, walked away with the newest Bill Snyder book, a mug, and coupons for Happy Meals, Big Macs and Wendy's combo meals.

"The people there do a good job of staying on track," she said. "It's hard not to have a good time."

At second in the Big 12 in alumni giving, Dowell said, K-State's giving is impressive – but can improve.

"It says a lot about the excellent academic programs, great student achievement and the dedicated alumni at K-State," he said.

Director's enthusiasm keeps Telefund spirits high

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gordon Dowell's enthusiasm is infectious.

During the month of KSU Foundation Telefund, his energy level does not appear to dwindle at all. For four weeks, he keeps about 80 college students excited about asking others for money.

"He can make any college student feel old, because he's got so much energy," said Leslie Bolz, student director and senior in marketing.

Bolz works several nights a week with Dowell, and said his attitude has started to rub off on her.

"I tend to be more reserved," she said.

"But he takes the energy level up, and makes it crazy and fun."

"That's just part of the job," he said. "You hope you get reasons to celebrate."

Dowell and his co-workers run around the room during Telefund, distributing prizes and handing over a microphone to students with instructions on motivational trash-talk for other students.

Another ringleader is Kent Nichols, student director and junior in agricultural economics.

READERS' REPRESENTATIVE FOR THE COLLEGIAN

More concise stories necessary

Amy can be reached at aml7555@k-state.edu

As we approach the end of February, one thing is clear – the lax days of the beginning of the semester are over, and the work is here.

Tests, projects and other forms of stress are being thrown at us, gobbling up all of our leisure time.

These things have readers commenting, "I just wish I had time to read the Collegian."

This comment is something the Collegian staff can relate to, being made up of students.

Therefore, knowing students don't have enough time to read, the Collegian has tried to present the information as concisely as possible.

For instance, letting you know when speakers are coming to K-State is a priority for the Collegian. However, knowing that readers may not have the time or desire to read a story about the speaker, we have opted to present the background in a graphic.

The Collegian staff knows it's not perfect. That means in this stressful time, writers will continue to make sure their stories are concise. We will strive to give you the information you need as efficiently as possible.

The lack of leisure time has left many readers in need of relief from hard news and in need of lighthearted information. Though a newspaper's responsibility is to cover those issues, being a college newspaper, we have more freedom to offer commentary just meant for entertainment.

The Collegian will try harder to find ways of keeping the attention of our information-overloaded readers.

Another comment I received concerned the coverage of the art sculptures on campus. One reader said that it was nice to have background on the art, because often the exhibits are left unexplained.

Readers also said they liked the clash of the columnists series on the opinion page that ran last week.

Opinion Editor Nasrina Williams said there will be at least two more clash series this semester for students to look forward to.

And who knows, if more readers respond, more people might be better satisfied with the Collegian.

If you have something you want to see more or less of – let me know, and I will do the best to get the changes made.

KSU senators, students discuss budget with legislators in Topeka

By Kristi Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

TOPEKA – About 20 K-State students lobbied to legislators Monday to urge the vote against Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' budget proposal.

Nearly 60 other students from other Kansas Board of Regents universities joined them.

The Students' Advisory Committee to the Regents passed a resolution last week protesting Sebelius' proposal, which would take funds from tuition and privilege fee revenue and place it in the general state fund.

Groups of students from K-State, the University of Kansas, Emporia State University, Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University and Pittsburg State University traveled from one legislator to another discussing the budget proposal and how it would affect universities if passed.

Student Body President, John O'Hara said of the six legislators he had talked to as of 1 p.m., all had shown interest in all the group had to say.

"They have all been responsive ,and several have already heard of the call backs and agree that it is a dangerous precedent to set," O'Hara said.

Christina Kerns, Emporia's student body president, said her biggest concern is the restricted funds and the call backs as well.

"That money is supposed to go to health and student housing. Budget-wise, it doesn't look good for any of us," Kerns said.

Kerns said Emporia has not decided where the money will come from to cover the governor's proposal. She said they will start in the next two weeks.

Dodge City Community College is a Regents community college, and Jennifer Mills, student body vice president, said this was the first State Education Day the community colleges were represented.

"We hope to get more into the day next year," she said.

"We really are grateful that K-State and Fort Hays State and everyone else let us represent here."

Dodge City does not have any restricted fees, so the budget cuts, if made, would raise tuition.

C.J. Ebeling, student body president at Dodge City, said the college is unsure of how the funding will appear.

"The president and deans still have to meet with the trustees," Ebeling said.

Daniel Hewes, governmental relations director at K-State-Salina, said the proposal would affect Salina in the same way it would the Manhattan campus, but would cost an additional $200,000.

"The proposal would take our 15 newest airplanes and put them into the state vehicle moratorium," Hewes said.

Hewes said when the planes were purchased, they were bought under lab materials. When the paperwork went through Manhattan, the planes were switched to state vehicles.

"I don't understand how they can put a tax on state vehicles, let alone K-State's airplanes," Hewes said.

Tyson Moore, governmental relations director at K-State, said the day brought opportunity to meet with more legislators than the past.

"This seems like it is going very well. We have seen several supportive legislators and we have pointed out some facts that they didn't see in the first place," Moore said.

Seth Bridge, governmental relations chair, said the special circumstances of the governor's proposal opened opportunity to inform legislators more than in the past.

"There are several issues concerning designated fees that the governor suggests we use to put in the state fund," Bridge said. "We really want to raise awareness.

"The compounding effects need to be highlighted. It is alarming to see how much tuition has gone up in the past four years."

Zach Mohr, junior in economics and student intern, said he is a student who has been overtaken by the increases.

"I'll be a senior, so it won't affect me too much. I have younger sisters and a brother that should not have to pay this much for higher education," Mohr said.

Ashley Boldt, sophomore in nutrition and exercise sciences and student intern, said she is already paying out of state tuition and does not look forward to the possibility of a high tuition increase.

"I'm already paying a higher tuition, the proposal really has a dangerous effect to our era," Boldt said.

Hill, Stein enter presidential election race

By Leigh Ochsner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

SGA ELECTIONS

The Student Governing Association primary elections are March 2 and 3. For more information, visit www.k-state.edu/elections.

Chris Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Dan Hill, junior in political science, and Thomas Stein, sophomore in business administration, announced Friday afternoon their candidacy for student body president and vice president, respectively.

One of the final candidates to file for student body president and vice president chose to run for office because they said they believe the other candidates can't deliver the promises they're making.

Dan Hill, junior in political science, and Thomas Stein, sophomore in marketing, filed Friday to run for student body president and vice president, respectively.

"I don't know that some of the other people running right now offer much to the table as far as realistic goals that they can accomplish," Hill said. "I think we have a better set of goals we can actually follow through with.

"The student government president doesn't run Topeka. We can voice our concerns. We can stay in contact with our Legislature and work with them," he said.

Hill said they want to showcase the university to bring in more out-of-state students over time, thus putting more money into the school.

Stein said that if elected, a committee would be formed to solicit more national conferences and meetings from different organizations. After the on-campus hotel is complete, the university will have more space and ability to accommodate guests, he said.

Stein said parking was an issue even after the approval of a new parking structure. Making sure students had parking spots and did not miss class was a priority.

The candidates suggest selling advertising to local businesses to offset the initial cost. Hill said he wanted to talk to construction companies to compare prices and discuss when construction could begin.

Adding more media to the library is another goal. Hill said Hale Library is one of the largest in the Big 12 but has one of the smallest book collections.

"There's people in different classes, such as Constitutional Law II, where the required texts they need for the course aren't even available in their own library," Hill said. "We'd really like to beef up the literature selection and make it the top of the tier."

Hill and Stein plan on listening to student's concerns. They have already been asking students on campus what issues they want addressed.

The candidates said they would like more information about student government printed in the newspaper and a forum opened to students twice a year.

"There needs to be some sort of accountability for SGA to make sure we're getting things done," Hill said. "It keeps us on our toes."

Architecture students get real-world experience

By Joanna Rubick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It doesn't happen often, but sometimes architecture students are given the opportunity to work with real customers on a project.

This semester, Don Watts, professor of architecture, gave his studio class this chance.

"I have done it before, but it has probably been around 10 years since I have," he said. "It's a matter of when the opportunity happens."

The studio class has been working since the beginning of the semester with the Baldwin City Lumberyard Arts Center Committee to make a vacant building into an arts center.

"I have spent a good deal of time working with the committee on what they want," Watts said.

"It was a good match. We could give them what they wanted, and they were able to give the students a new learning experience."

The students work with the existing structures. On the first day of class, they went out to Baldwin City for measurements.

"The nature of the building and the problems make it a good project," he said.

Matt Lero, junior in architecture, said the class was required to make two separate designs – one using only the existing structures and one where they add on.

"It's different using an existing structure, because you don't have all the freedom you normally would," he said.

Lero said they already presented the two ideas to the committee.

"It's been great working with them, because they are really excited," he said.

"Their input has helped to know what they want."

Studio students are currently working on the final model which will only have one design.

The experience, Lero said, is as close as it gets to the real world.

"It's a step closer to what the real thing will be," he said. "It's more of a real project where we are actually dealing with real people."

David Ducker, junior in architecture, agreed.

"It's getting us exposure," he said. "This is a very real life experiment, because you are presenting to people outside of Seaton Hall."

TO THE POINT

Drop policy for non-attendance should stay same

The Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee's proposal to change the time period in which faculty members may drop a student from a class due to non-attendance is an inconvenience to both teachers and students.

Currently, the policy states that instructors can drop a student from a class after one week of absence with no effort to contact the instructor.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Under the proposal, however, faculty members could drop students after they fail to attend the first day of class.

This proposal could cause problems, as Student Senate members indicated.

Students often miss their first class because they are returning to school from a prior engagement, such as an internship or a study-abroad trip.

As a result, students may have to eliminate internships or study-abroad trips just to make sure they attend the first day of class.

The proposal would cause more work for faculty members as well.

Instead of waiting one week to drop students, faculty members would have to do it days earlier, thus dropping more students.

A better idea would be to keep the current policy.

Students pay for class and as a result, they can also pay to miss their first class.

WEDNESDAY'S OPINIONS

BARBARA MEYER

Barbara Meyer examines the applicability of the University of Colorado's situation to K-State.

PAUL RESTIVO

Uncertain courtesy

Misunderstandings between chivalry and manners cause uneasiness

My life is fraught with unease.

No, I'm not talking about my perpetual fear of the Japanese mafia, nor do I mean the occasional awkwardness that slaps me in the face when I say the wrong thing at the wrong time.

JONATHAN LAMB

Those are, to be sure, serious considerations on a daily basis, but I am referring to an unease with which I do not struggle alone.

It is the unease, nay, the crisis, of courtesy and feminism.

Follow me into a hypothetical universe not unlike our own.

It's just an average Kansas day, temperature ranging anywhere from just above absolute zero to just below the fiery reefs of the Lake of Fire. The wind blows from the north, bringing with it a scent of cow dung and prairie grass. The K-State campus is a teeming ruckus of intellectual activity (like I said, hypothetical).

As he approaches the building, he stops, steps back, and holds open the door for the woman.

From his spine to his fingertips, in the depths of his heart and the darkest fathoms of his soul, he feels nothing but ungendered courtesy.

He doesn't even take notice of whether the person behind him is a woman or man.

Chivalry, oppression, and misogyny are further from his mind than the question of what kind of sunscreen yellow elephants would wear. He simply means to be kind.

But the woman doesn't walk through the door.

Instead, she checks her pace and enters through a different door, leaving him confused and, since he's the sensitive type, a bit sad.

Now, what exactly went wrong here?

Should the man have simply walked through the door without a thought to the people following? Should he have pushed the door open but not stopped? Perhaps just a kick on the metal plate – isn't that called a kickplate? – would have sufficed.

And what about the woman?

Should she have walked through the door, in spite of what she perceived to be an unnecessarily anti-feminist action? Should she have stopped and said, "No, please, after you."

Maybe she should have thrown her books to the ground, punched him in the stomach, and given him a few light slams.

To make no gesture at all would have undermined his own principles, but to make any gesture would have undermined hers. That is not to say she doesn't value courtesy, nor is it to say that he doesn't value feminism.

But there are, in this case and a multitude of real-life cases, two apparently conflicting ideas.

Was he wrong to offer kindness? Was she wrong to deny his kindness as a matter of principle?

Most of us would agree: no, and no.

Every time I pass a broken-down car on the highway or encounter a long line at Chipotle, I nearly explode with the uncertainty that the motives permeating every pore of my body and wrinkle of my brain will somehow go awry and find themselves misunderstood by the very people to whom I meant to show kindness.

Here we find the crux of the matter: there is forever a slippage between what we intend and what others perceive our intentions to be.

So often what we mean as a compliment somehow hits home as an insult. What we mean purely in jest results in the most awkward of silences. Altruism is received as condescension, seriousness as sarcasm, attraction as weird obsession.

Is this slippage inevitable? Must we forever live, uneasy, with the risk of being misunderstood?

I could, I suppose, wear a sign on my back that reads, "If I open the door for you, it's about courtesy and not about chivalry."

I could issue a disclaimer for every action I make. I could, in order never to be misinterpreted, sit as still as possible, drinking only tepid water.

Or, I could quit worrying about it.

Morning-after pill should be an acceptable choice

Few topics in our society stir as much emotion as the debate concerning women's right to make their own reproductive choices.

The recent FDA advisory committee endorsement of over-the-counter sales of emergency contraception (aka "the morning-after pill") has fueled the controversy, especially on the part of the conservative right.

MICKAYLA FINK

It's obvious I have issues with conservatives, but what I don't understand is how the so-called right-to-life folks can have problems with emergency contraception.

First, let's start off with a few facts: EC is not an abortion pill. It is a higher concentration of the same hormones in birth control pills. It prevents the release of an egg if taken prior to ovulation, and prevents implantation if an egg has already been released.

It simply prevents pregnancy from occurring.

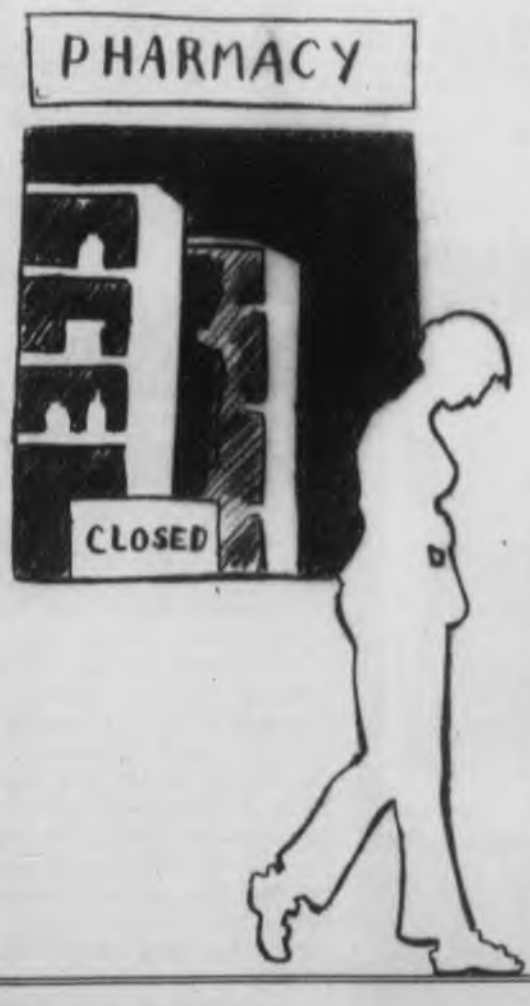
Emergency contraception will not cause a miscarriage in an already existing pregnancy.

What could anti-abortion advocates have against a contraceptive measure that does not end a pregnancy, but has the ability to prevent thousands of would-be abortions?

A rational person might think this would be something right-to-life people would rally behind, right? Apparently not.

The fact that EC is not an abortion pill pulls the "saving the unborn" rug out from under this argument. Why, then, would many anti-abortion groups also be against emergency contraception?

I think the answer lies in the evidence. These groups are not anti-abortion, rather they are anti-choice.



If they were anti-abortion, they wouldn't have a problem with a pill that could prevent pregnancies that eventually might be aborted.

Rep. Dave Weldon (R-Fla), along with a group of conservative legislators recently urged the Bush administration to reject the over-the-counter approval.

The basis of their argument was hypocrisy created by Bush's abstinence-only agenda, yet approving the morning-after pill for over-the-counter sales.

So the rest of the women in the country must be penalized because Bush backs an abstinence-only campaign in high school sex-education classes? Now that's a pathetic argument. Or do these guys really think the abstinence-only plan applies beyond high school?

Whether emergency contraception is available over the counter might not seem like a big deal, but it is.

The pills only are effective if taken within 72 hours of intercourse, and it can be quite an ordeal to find a doctor to write a prescription on a weekend. Not to mention the added cost and time that a doctor's visit entails.

An even worse scenario took place in Texas in January.

Three pharmacists were fired after refusing to fill the emergency contraception prescription of a woman who had been raped. All cited religious reasons, and all equated it to an abortion.

The fact that pharmacists equated EC with abortion is scary. Next to doctors, pharmacists should understand what drugs do and what purposes they are used for better than anyone else.

The scariest part of this story is that the men who were fired had refused to fill the prescription before for other women.

This was just the first rape victim they had denied. Why weren't they fired for refusing the other women?

I'm not minimizing rape, but if you are a pharmacist, you don't get to decide what treatment people get to receive based upon your religious beliefs.

Imagine if a pharmacist told a cancer patient, "Well, God gave you cancer, and God didn't create chemotherapy – sorry!"

Both situations contain the same principles.

The more conservatives are able to make this a matter of public discourse, the more able they are to control the lives of us all, especially women.

Personally, I don't need a man or woman in Washington, D.C., to tell me what I can or cannot do with my body. And I certainly don't need to be hassled by a pharmacist with a telepathic connection to God.

The over-the-counter availability of emergency contraception would allow women more privacy in making reproductive decisions – privacy that often is not respected by medical professionals.

Report: HIV cases increase in N.C.; K-State sees no increase

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A study from the University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill indicates the number of new HIV cases among college students in the region has risen recently.

Despite the increases in North Carolina, Jay Reppert, medical director at the Lafene Student Health Center, said he did not believe the problem was escalating at K-State.

"If it were widespread," Reppert said, "Everyone would know it."

Lisa Hightow, physician and clinical instructor of infectious diseases at North Carolina, said the study showed a "widespread" trend of newly diagnosed HIV in 37 different colleges in North Carolina and surrounding states.

"It's not just limited to one area," she said.

"It's a diffused problem and that's concerning."

The study, Hightow said, focused on acute infection.

Hightow said the state, which has a program to detect acute HIV infection, listed six newly infected individuals in 2000 and 30 cases in 2003.

The problem is not limited to the south, Hightow said.

"There is no reason to believe it is limited to North Carolina or the South," she said.

She said the study only focused on North Carolina, so she did not have evidence showing the problem was a national issue.

"I can see no reason to think it's not at other colleges," she said. "We would not have found this if we hadn't looked for it."

Hightow said unprotected sex is the likely culprit for the recent increase in infection.

"Anywhere young people are having unprotected sex, there is a risk for HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases," Hightow said.

Another reason for concern outside of the Carolinas, she said, was the issue of travel.

"Travel outside of North Carolina is relatively common among college students who were infected," she said.

Reppert said there is no way for health officials to know of an epidemic if people do not get tested, but he did not believe there was any kind of a hidden epidemic.

"We have not noticed and increase in HIV at Lafene Student Health Center," he said.

While Reppert said the study results were not manifesting themselves at K-State, the results still aré worrisome.

"It does worry me," he said. "This is a disease that, if we become careless, can become widespread very easily."

The Kansas Department of Health and Environment's most recent survey shows the total number of new HIV cases in Kansas has been falling over the past decade.

This is believed to be due in part to an increase in education.

Hightow said they are seeking an increase in funding from the Centers for Disease Control for this very purpose.

"Our concern is that we are not reaching this population with our current prevention methods," she said.

The problem, she said, is that the group is lacking the financial flexibility to alter current practices.

"Without more money, we are limited," Hightow said.

"Our main goal is to get this information out and public."

Legislators to consider gun bill

By Bill Draper
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – A bill that would allow Kansans to carry concealed weapons cleared a hurdle Monday.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee voted 13-7 to send the legislation to the full House, along with an amendment defining school property. The bill prohibits concealed guns in government buildings and schools, but the committee had a hard time determining what constitutes school property.

Under the bill, an applicant for a concealed-carry permit would submit paperwork and a $150 application fee to the local sheriff's office.

The sheriff would keep $40 and forward $110 plus the paperwork to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, which would conduct background checks and issue permits to qualified applicants.

KBI officials have said the agency is neutral on the question of concealed weapons but opposes being given the administrative responsibilities required by the bill.

A concealed guns bill won legislative approval in 1997 but was vetoed by then-Gov. Bill Graves.

Medication costs weigh on students' wallets

Odd weather patterns combined with the the stress brought on by the semester's first wave of exams could be the cause of students getting sick.

The shifting temperatures can cause students to get a cough or circulate flu bugs, and exams may be causing stress-induced headaches.

To find out which pharmacies were the most budget-friendly, five pharmacies were checked for five specific products to see who was providing the best prices.

The five products all are highly used by students and are popular brand names.

The products include a pain killer, an allergy medicine, cough syrup, a stomach ache medicine and birth control.

The five pharmacies were predominantly on the east side of town.

Women's golf team in 3rd place in Florida meet

By Matt Stuchlik
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With 75-degree weather, the team is sitting in third place after two rounds and 36 holes.

"I'm very proud of every golfer today," Coach Kristi Knight said. "All the golfers played within themselves, and nobody got upset with poor shots."

Junior Sarah Heffel leads all Wildcats at one over par, shooting a 145. This score also places her in third place individually.

The first 36 holes were played Monday. The final round of 18 holes will be played Tuesday morning.

"Sarah stayed patient today and fought hard through the opening 36 holes of play," Knight said.

The cold, winter weather in Manhattan the past couple weeks has prevented the team from practicing outside.

Even without the outdoor practice, the Cats came ready to pounce on Florida's River Wilderness Golf Course.

"I'm enjoying the warm weather down here in Florida, and as a team we turned in some low scores," senior Christine Boucher said.

Boucher is tied for 13th after shooting a 150.

She is ranked No. 14 along with a No. 2 ranking in the Big 12.

"I'm pleased with my play today, but I just need to remember to remain patient and play my game," Boucher said.

"I came out a little inconsistent in the first round with three double-bogeys on my way to a score of 78."

Also playing for the Cats Monday was senior Karen Quintelier, who shot a 153, which was good enough for a 25th place tie, and senior Stephanie Limoges added a stroke total of 168.

"Even though the girls only had eight holes of warm up, they came out ready to play," Knight said.

In first place after rounds one and two is Louisiana State with a team score of 593. Following closely is Michigan State with 596. K-State is only six strokes behind the leader with a team total of 599.

Final round golf play will resume 8 a.m Tuesday.

Former K-State quarterback Ell Roberson, seen here in the Fiesta Bowl against Ohio State, is preparing for a possible career in the NFL. Roberson is being hindered by surgery that took place two weeks ago to repair a torn right rotator cuff. The rehabilitation time for the injury is leaving Roberson's draft status unknown.

Roberson will return to campus for last 8 weeks, has no anger for Coach Snyder

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Roberson

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – Former K-State quarterback Ell Roberson, stripped of his scholarship following an incident prior to the Fiesta Bowl, is taking a class via the Internet and plans to be on campus in Manhattan for the final eight weeks of the semester.

Roberson, interviewed by the Kansas City Star at the NFL's scouting combine in Indianapolis, said he has no ill will toward Coach Bill Snyder and his disciplinary action.

"I don't fault him for it," Roberson told the Star. "It was the best way for it to be taken care of, and that's how he took care of it."

A 22-year-old woman told police Roberson sexually assaulted her at the team's suburban Phoenix hotel the night before the bowl game. Roberson acknowledged having sex with the woman but said it was consensual; he was not charged with any offense.

Roberson played in the game, which K-State lost to Ohio State 35-28, but Snyder later announced he would not get a Fiesta Bowl ring and stripped him of his scholarship for the spring semester.

He said his "loving family" and a Pell Grant are covering his school costs.

Roberson, who has completed his college athletic eligibility, was at the scouting combine only as a spectator following recent surgery for a torn right rotator cuff. He said he was more concerned about how the surgery would affect his status for the NFL draft.

"What happened, happened, and I've moved on from it," he said. "I'm not dwelling on the past."

Roberson said he had surgery two weeks ago and faces at least a month of rehabilitation.

"At least if I get a chance after it gets healed up, I should be all right," he said. "I'm expecting to be a late-round pick or if not, free agency."

Former NBA star goes from good guy to disappointment

JOSH WITT

Sure, I might admire the way someone could knock down a jump shot, throw a fast ball or catch a touchdown, but I would always leave it at that.

Common sense usually tells us although the athletes we see on television may possess abilities that we envy, as far as we know, their personalities and character could be far from what we would want to strive to achieve.

But there have been exceptions to the rule.

For me, former NBA star Jayson Williams was one of them.

I actually looked up to the guy.

Truthfully, I never followed Williams' career that much.

However, it wasn't until Williams' career had come to a close in 2000 that I looked at the former New Jersey Nets' star in a different light.

My junior year of high school, I happened to pick up his autobiography in a bookstore.

"Loose Balls" was the title of the book about the NBA and his life, and truthfully, the title is what drug me in.

If it was called "Basketball is Good Times" I probably would not of thought twice at buying the book, but judging by the humorous title, I knew it would be an entertaining read.

I wasn't disappointed.

He gave a unique behind-the-scenes perspective of the NBA, giving a comical, no nonsense look at his life in the process.

But that wasn't the best part of the book.

I discovered for the first time the generosity of Williams.

While most athletes keep the majority of their bloated salaries to themselves, Williams gave much of his money and time back to charities and communities.

"I really believe I was put on this earth to help people, and that's why in the summer I go to three or four hospitals a week to visit sick kids, and why I help hand out food to homeless people," Williams said on page 183.

Unable to reach a long-term deal with Peyton Manning, the Indianapolis Colts designated the NFL's co-MVP their franchise player Monday.

Manning

The deal guarantees Manning $18.4 million next season if he remains Indianapolis' franchise player.

The Colts hope their quarterback settles for a more salary-cap friendly deal that allows them to sign the defensive players they badly need.

"We're going to get a deal worked out, hopefully, in the next 10 or 11 days," Coach Tony Dungy said. "Maybe sooner than that."

CBB | Police arrest man found on Iowa State plane

A Lawrence man was arrested when police found him aboard the Iowa State Cyclones' charter plane after the game at Kansas on Saturday.

Police were called to search the plane about an hour after Kansas beat Iowa State 90-89 in overtime.

Pilots of the team's charter plane, from Fina Air of San Juan, Puerto Rico, told police a man who didn't have a ticket had climbed onto the plane while they were outside fueling. The cabin door was open.

The man had tried to board another plane at Lawrence Municipal Airport, but crew members stopped him before he made it inside.

MLB | Former umpire pleads guilty in fraud case

Former major league umpire Al Clark pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy to commit mail fraud in connection with selling baseballs he falsely claimed had been used in memorable games.

Clark

The 56-year-old Clark, formerly of Trenton and now of Williamsburg, Va., had claimed some of the balls were used during games in which Cal Ripken tied and broke Lou Gehrig's consecutive games record.

Clark pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court. Memorabilia dealer Richard Graessle Jr., a 43-year-old from Millburn, pleaded guilty to tax evasion for his role in the scheme, which operated from September 1995 to November 1998.

The pair told U.S. District Court Judge John Bissell that they sold balls that they falsely claimed had been used in Dwight Gooden's May 1996 no-hitter for the New York Yankees, the 1978 AL East tiebreaker playoff between the Yankees and Boston Red Sox and Nolan Ryan's 300th career victory in July 1990.

NBA | Pistons fined $200K for ineligibles

The Detroit Pistons were fined $200,000 by the NBA on Monday for using Rasheed Wallace and Mike James before the deal that brought them to the team was finalized.

Wallace

Wallace and James were acquired in a three-team trade with Atlanta and Boston last Thursday, and both played in the first half of the Pistons' 88-87 loss to the Minnesota Timberwolves on Friday night.

Both players were pulled at halftime when it was discovered that the paperwork for two other players in the deal — Lindsey Hunter and Chris Mills — had yet to be completed. Wallace and James also missed a practice Saturday before the NBA declared the trade "final and complete."

Tennis | Martinez advances to 2nd round of tournament

Former Wimbledon champion Conchita Martinez of Spain defeated Eva Birnerova of the Czech Republic 7-6 (3), 6-3 Monday to reach the second round of the Copa Colsanitas.

Martinez, the 1994 Wimbledon champion, has 32 career WTA singles titles and was ranked No. 2 in the world in 1995.

One-night wonders

In addition to the awkwardness of facing a former fling on campus, other consequences of one-night stands could range from health to emotional and social issues. The unique atmosphere of a college campus and its surrounding social spectrum can create ample opportunities for students to find themselves in bad situations.

Alcohol fuels one-night stands; students left with awkward situations, STD risk

By Layton Ehmke
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some might call one-night stands commonplace, just for fun, meaningless or emotionally draining, but most would agree one-night stands are predominantly fueled by alcohol.

Sarah Smith, sophomore in education, said the one-night stand is easy to define.

"It's when somebody sleeps with someone one time and never talks to them again," Smith said.

Jessica Sylvester, senior in nutrition, said it would be awkward to encounter one's partner after a one-night stand.

"If you saw them on campus, it would be weird," Sylvester said.

She said those who choose to spend the night with someone they don't know must be careful.

"A one-night stand is where you leave when you wake up after realizing what you've done," she said.

The difference between people who engage in these activities and those who do not has a lot to do with two main ingredients: confidence and alcohol.

Kelly Ellsworth, senior in marketing, said, alcohol consumption can lead to such encounters.

"People out at the bars have made their mistakes. If it happens one time and you regret it, it shouldn't happen again," Ellsworth said.

Smith agrees.

"People let go of their inhibitions, beer goggles and all, which plays into it about half the time. A lot of people don't think ahead. They get caught up in the moment," Smith said.

Sylvester said she finds it challenging to find someone at the bars who potentially would be long-term relationship material, and it's obvious who's just looking for a good time.

"It's a scary thing for girls to think about, but girls are scandalous, too," she said. "We all see those people. They're asking for it. You pick up on the sexual tension."

Dan Thornton, a bouncer at Rusty's Last Chance Saloon and Restaurant, said one-night stands are not something he practices because of the dangers and other things he'd rather not worry about.

"Most of it has something to do with someone's upbringing, what they believe in. It depends on if you decide to go to college and decide to go buck-wild. Alcohol has a huge part to play in it, but there's no piece of ass worth catching something you'll carry for the rest of your life," he said.

According to officials at Lafene Health Center, one in three sexually active people carry some sort of sexually transmitted disease.

Carol Kennedy, director of Health Promotion at Lafene, said they offer a screening test for some diseases for students are who concerned.

"I recommend for people who are sexually active that they be tested for their own peace of mind because many STDs are symptomless. That's why many are spread. Some of them cannot be cured," Kennedy said.

Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene, said knowing someone's personality doesn't equate knowing their sexual history.

"Knowing someone or knowing that they're a good person does not give you any information on whether you get an STD or not," he said.

"There is not just one test for everything. It behooves someone to get to know someone as much as possible. If you're interested in being sexually active with someone, get tested together, be safe and use condoms," Kennedy said.

Kennedy is also the instructor and adviser for Sexual Health Awareness and Peer Educators, which plays an active role in promoting sexual health awareness.

"It's possibly successful because students will listen to their peers. It gets the message out there: how to prevent risky behavior," she said. "Once someone receives the education, they have to apply it to their own lives. That's what we hope happens."

"Rocky Horror Punk Rock Show"
★★★★☆
Album review by Corbin H. Crable

Since the cult classic film "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" first brought the Time Warp to movie theaters everywhere in 1975, the movie and its music gave social misfits everywhere a place to belong.

The movie enjoyed a wide fan base, composed of the most die-hard fans and straight-laced "virgins" alike.

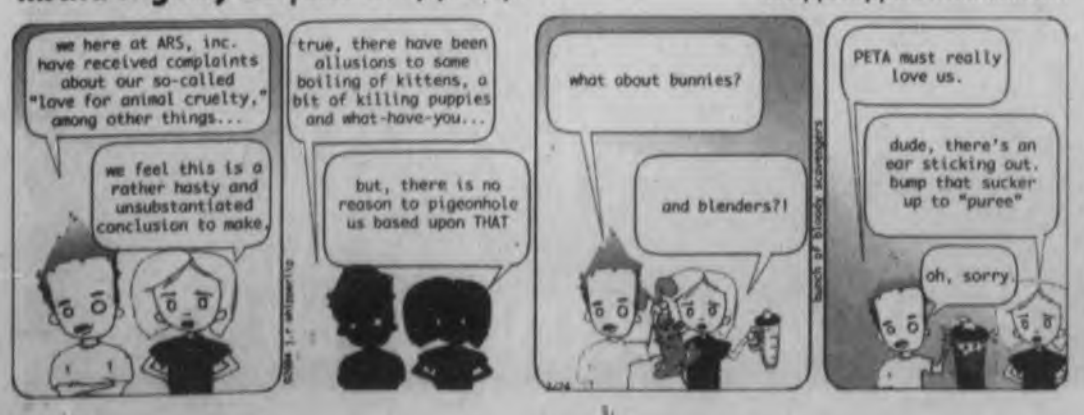
The Rocky Horror Punk Rock Show, however, is an album that pays homage to the punk-rock music genre, the fans of whom the movie was originally intended.

The rise of punk and of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" in the 1970s was that generation's answer to the disco craze. Every band represented in the Rocky Horror Punk Rock Show album perfectly captures the essence of the film and the era in which it rose to popularity.

A range of punk groups are represented in the album, each covering a different track from the movie. From the first song "Science Fiction/Double Feature" by Me First and the Gimmie Gimmies, to the last song "Super Heroes" by Ruth's Hat, the sound of each band is distinctly its own, yet each retains some of the harmonies are specific to the movie.

Many of the vocals take pains to ensure they retain the sound of the movie's characters in each song. Specifically, Apocalypse Hoboken blends their own flowing guitar solos well with their lead vocalist, who sounds hauntingly like Tim Curry's Dr. Frank-N-Furter.

The same goes for the Chubbies and their cover of "Touch-a, Touch-a, Touch Me," which captures the feeling of Janet's lost innocence with the playful yet striking backup vocals.



Out of place, however, is Big D and the Kids Table's cover of "Once in a While," a song that was cut from the movie when it was released. The song itself seems out of place for a fast-paced punk album.

The cover of "Once in a While" isn't as much punk as it is ska, which breaks the fast-paced flow of the other tracks. The album, like the movie, would do well to leave out the song altogether.

The rest of the album makes up for this error with a strong guitar presence in the covers of "Eddie's Teddy" (by the Swingin' Utters), "Rose Tint My World/Floor Show" (by Luckie Strike), and "Don't Dream It" (by Stunt Monkey). Each cover is the band's own tribute to the movie that punk created, and they surely will take their place alongside the film in terms of musical immortality.

World court considers barrier between Palestine and Israel

By Arthur Max
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

"This is a political issue, and it should be resolved through dialogue and negotiation between the parties."

Scott McClellan
WHITE HOUSE SPOKESMAN

THE HAGUE, Netherlands – Palestinians presented an impassioned case to the world court Monday against the Israeli separation barrier in the West Bank, while Israel appealed to world opinion to ignore the proceedings it called inherently unfair.

The International Court of Justice began three days of oral hearings on the legality of the barrier slicing through Palestinian territory, bringing Israel's occupation policies before an international tribunal for the first time.

The United States and Europe joined Israel in staying away.

The opening session came a day after a Palestinian bomber killed eight Israelis and wounded dozens on a Jerusalem bus. The Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, a group with ties to Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, claimed responsibility.

Israel said the attack showed the need for the barrier, designed to impede terrorism. But the Palestinians argued the structure only fuels the resentment that inspires suicide bombers.

The Bush administration insisted again Monday that the court should not be involved in the dispute over the fence. "This is a political issue and it should be resolved through dialogue and negotiation between the parties," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Outside the baroque Peace Palace at the Hague, Israelis bearing photographs of relatives who died in suicide attacks clustered around the shell of a Jerusalem bus destroyed three weeks ago by a bomber who killed 11 people.

Later, more than 1,000 pro-Palestinian demonstrators marched from the Dutch parliament to the seat of the court, chanting and carrying photographs of Palestinian children killed by Israeli soldiers.

Thousands of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip also marched in protest against Israel's separation barrier, and in some locations were pushed back by Israeli soldiers firing tear gas.

The General Assembly asked the United Nations' highest judicial body last December to give a nonbinding advisory opinion on the legality of the network of walls, razor-wire fences and electronic monitors, now one-third completed.

Though the court cannot demand action, the Palestinians hoped for a clear-cut judgment that would build pressure on Israel to dismantle the barrier, which is disrupting the lives of hundreds of thousands of West Bank residents.

Israel has begun making minor changes in the route of the barrier to reduce its impact on Palestinians and promised further changes. Israel has made it clear, however, it would not be swayed from action it deems necessary to protect its citizens.

The Palestinians see the situation differently.

"This wall is not about security. It is about entrenching the occupation and the de facto annexation of large areas of the Palestinian land," the chief Palestinian delegate, Nasser Al-Kidwa, told the tribunal.

As the arguments unfolded in the oak-paneled Grand Hall of Justice of the 90-year-old Peace Palace, it became apparent that the Palestinians hoped to put Israel's 37-year occupation – not just its security measures – on trial.

UN says Iraqi elections possible by January 2005 if preparations begin

By Nick Wadhams
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

"It's not just a game for a few actors — it's a game for all the Iraqi citizens."

Carina Perelli
U.N. EXPERT ON THE MISSION TO IRAQ

UNITED NATIONS – Elections for a new Iraqi government would be possible by January 2005 – but only if preparations begin immediately, the United Nations said in a report released Monday.

Lakhdar Brahimi, the U.N. secretary-general's envoy to Iraq, warned of increased violence and ethnic strife unless Iraq's leaders and the U.S.-led coalition get Iraqis' acceptance for a way forward.

His report followed a weeklong mission earlier this month by a team of U.N. experts who were essentially asked to resolve a dispute between the United States and Iraqi clerics on the best way to restore sovereignty to Iraq.

The team said there wasn't enough time for national elections by a June 30 deadline. Iraqis led by cleric Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Husseini al-Sistani had wanted a direct vote as soon as possible.

The preferred U.S. option of holding a series of national caucuses to elect a transitional legislature would be too easy to manipulate to be credible, the team said. Under intense opposition from Iraqis, the United States has since backed away from that idea.

The report said that if preparations began immediately, Iraq would need until May 2004 to create the necessary legal and political framework for elections. It would then need another eight months to prepare for the elections on the ground meaning elections could by held by January 2005.

Brahimi's report underscores that Iraqis and the U.S.-led coalition must find a solution they both believe in, or the election process could backfire and turn simmering ethnic tensions into outright sectarian violence.

"We have made very clear with Mr. Brahimi that everybody has to buy into this process if the process is to be stable," said Carina Perelli, a U.N. expert on the mission to Iraq. "It's not just a game for a few actors – it's a game for all the Iraqi citizens."

Brahimi noted the daunting task Iraq faces because it has no viable recent census, only one from 1997 that was widely believed to be manipulated, and Iraqi law is even unclear on what it means to be a citizen. But in a note of optimism, he said there is strong will among Iraqis for healthy political system and says Iraq is "a dynamic place, full of ideas and political arguments."

L. Paul Bremer, the lead U.S. administrator in Iraq, welcomed the report, calling it "a constructive contribution" toward the transition to Iraqi sovereignty, according to a statement released in Baghdad. He reaffirmed the June 30 deadline would be met.

The report leaves open the question of how to turn over power to Iraqis by that date, however.

The Bush administration has been hoping that the United Nations would endorse the idea of extending and expanding the U.S.-picked Iraqi Governing Council so it can take interim control of the country on June 30.

The report lists that as one of several options, but Brahimi's spokesman Ahmad Fawzi made clear the report was not the forum for making such a recommendation. Instead, he said, the United Nations was ready to help the party's decide how to put a transitional government in place by June 30.

TELEFUND | Officials focus on positive attitudes

Nichols said he was amazed Dowell was still so upbeat after 19 years at the Foundation. Circumstances, such as Telefund's previous location in the K-State Student Union, showed Nichols how amazing Dowell's accomplishments were.

Telefund annual giving was at about $338,000 when Dowell took over.

Now, the number has risen to more than $1.4 million per year.

"He must love K-State a lot," Nichols said.

No circumstance or inconvenience will get in the way of a successful Telefund, Dowell said.

Unwelcoming call recipients, though Dowell said they are rare, have the potential to create tense situations.

He keeps the atmosphere relaxed by focusing on the good things and using momentum to maintain positive attitudes.

"Once things get rolling, it's like a snowball rolling down a hill," he said. "You just can't stop it."

The committee is trying to be fair and realistic about the approach it is taking.

"It's appropriate and not something to rush headlong into," Fairchild said.

The policy as a whole is worthwhile, but the language of the policy will be difficult to dictate, said Sam Meier, student senator and Faculty Senate representative .

The idea was not brought on by a problem, but as a preemptive solution to a potential problem.

"Fewer sections are being offered, and there are caps on enrollment," Meier said.

There were concerns expressed by Student Senate about the policy mandating that students attend the first day of class or be dropped from the roster, Meier said.

If you go

Faculty Senate meeting

When: 3:30 p.m. March 9
Where: Union Big 12 Room.

With student internships or study abroad trips during breaks, it may not be plausible for them to return by the school starts.

"The committee would like it to be changed to the second day," Meier said.

"It may not be possible for students to come back on Thursday – it may be easier for them to come back on a weekend."

Anne Bianculli, a member of the Academic Affairs Committee for Student Senate, is one who is concerned about the change in policy.

Many professors don't enforce the current policy, and it would be hard for students to go through a big change so quickly, Bianculli said.

"For students to go from having a week to be dropped or possibly not being dropped at all to being dropped in one day would be a huge impact," she said.

If such a dramatic change is made, it will hurt students more than it will help them, Bianculli said.

In order to make it to the first day of class, which may just be a syllabus day, students may have to give up other activities, such as internships or studying abroad.

A college-by-college policy would make more sense, she said, because some colleges may find the policy necessary to get classes started right away, while others may not.

"In my experience, I don't think it's that big of a deal," she said.

"I don't see the purpose of changing it."

Meier said he thinks the proposal has a good chance of being passed.

"I think the faculty definitely sees the merits in it," he said.

HAITI | Rebel groups continue to take over country

More than half of Haiti is now beyond the control of the central government. In Cap-Haitien on Monday, rebels hunted down militants loyal to Aristide, accusing them of terrorizing the population in the days before the fall of the northern port city of 500,000.

"I am a brick mason, I didn't do anything wrong," Jean-Bernard Prevalis, 33, pleaded as he was dragged away, head bleeding.

"We're going to clean the city of all 'chimeres,'" said rebel Dieusauver Magustin, 26. Chimere, which means ghost, is used to describe hardcore Aristide militants.

It was not clear what would happen to those detained. One rebel said they were saving them from lynching. But another, Claudy Philippe, said "The people show us the (chimere) houses. If they are there, we execute them."

Residents went on a rampage of reprisals and looting that began after the insurgents seized the city. Looters stole the 800 tons of food from the U.N. World Food Program warehouse, and people torched the colonial mansion of Mayor Wilmar Innocent, who supports Aristide.

Rebel leader Guy Philippe said his men could do nothing to stop the looting, and blamed Aristide's government for leaving most of Haiti's 8 million people hungry and desperate. However, some rebels later fired shots into the air to scatter looters at Cap-Haitien's seaport; at least two looters were hit by rebel gunfire and taken to a hospital.

Philippe said more than 30 residents have volunteered to fight with the insurgents, who have started to replace officials in Cap-Haitien with rebel sympathizers. He said in an interview Monday that he hopes to take Port-au-Prince by Sunday, his 36th birthday.

Remissainthe Ravix, another rebel leader, told the Associated Press there was no turning back.

"We have the weapons and the expertise to take the country," he said. "Nothing can stop us."

The rebels cut cellular telephone service in the city, saying they wanted no communication with Port-au-Prince.

COLUMN | Role model falls short of expectations

"Nothing makes me feel better than seeing how I can cheer someone up."

Most celebrities run their mouth about "helping the kids," but Williams backed it up.

I would like to be that generous, I told myself at the time.

Outside of his giving, there was another big reason I looked up to Williams.

He liked to have fun.

Yes, he worked hard at his game and was selfless in giving away his time and money, but man, the guy could party.

As someone who liked – and still likes – to go out and have a good time, I got a kick out of all Williams' stories about living it up.

He was a loose example of what I wanted to be.

I wanted to be a person who could get the job done, be a good person and have a great time in the process.

Now, four years after reading "Loose Balls", the last man I want to be is Williams.

The former NBA All-Star is standing trial for the shooting death of a limousine driver in 2002.

He is charged with aggravated manslaughter and witness tampering for killing the limo driver with a shotgun blast at a party in his home, and then attempting to make the death appear to be a suicide.

So much for a role model.

We see examples everyday – Kobe Bryant for one – of athletes proving they might not be the great guys they appear to be to the public, but many of us still have that one team or player we think is above everything.

Williams was one of those players to me.

He was one of the good guys.

As the evidence mounts in Williams' trial and he appears guiltier by the day, I remind myself to not fall into the trap of revering someone I don't even know.

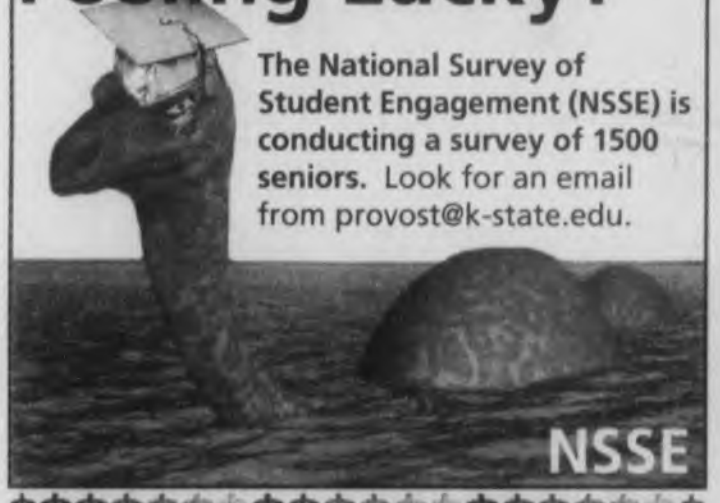
"Now if people want to get wild and throw a party, get crazy, they have to come do it at my house," Williams said. "I'm not always an angel. But if I'm a devil at home, no one gets hurt."



Very sad, very eerie.

If only he knew.

Tough trip South

K-State women fight for 1st place in Big 12 against Texas Longhorns

By Louie Novak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sunday is supposed to be a day of rest, a day to kick back and relax and prepare for another tough week.

However, for the second-straight weekend the women's basketball teams of Texas and K-State will be hard at work on Sunday with the Big 12 regular season title on the line.

K-State holds a one-game lead over the Longhorns after No. 5 Texas (23-3, 11-2) was defeated by Texas Tech (23-4, 9-4) last Sunday 62-49 in Lubbock.

The Lady Raiders held Texas to just two field goals in the first 11 minutes of the second half, and the Longhorns got no closer than six points as Tech knocked off the then top-ranked Longhorns.

Texas Tech used a defense that disrupted the inside game of Texas and held the team to 49 points, the lowest of the year for the Longhorns.

The No. 9 Wildcats (21-3, 12-1) were tested by their road opponent as well on Sunday, but K-State overcame a 15-point deficit to Missouri in Columbia and escaped with a double-overtime victory and full control of the Big 12 title.

Kendra Wecker scored nine of her 26 points in the second overtime to lead her team past the Tigers, 93-90.

Missouri got a strong performance from Evan Unrau, who had a career-high 40 points, the most in the Big 12 this season, but the Tigers couldn't knock off a resilient K-State squad.

The Wildcats rallied from a double-digit halftime deficit for the second straight game.

K-State trailed by 10 points before defeating Texas A&M 59-56 on Wednesday, and was behind 40-29 at the half against the Tigers.

The Longhorns are 12-0 in Austin, and Texas is an impressive 40-4 in its last 44 games.

Texas' offense is a balanced scoring attack that finds six players averaging between 8.6 through 13.2 points per game, led by 6-2 junior Heather Schreiber (13.2) and 6-3 freshman Tiffany Jackson (12.7 ppg).

5 things you didn't know about the women's team

Domenico

1.Chelsea Domenico recently underwent a change in hair color along with Kendra Wecker and Megan Mahoney. Domenico said she is a brunette naturally, but she loves blond hair. The three decided to go to the salon when Domenico didn't like how her roots were growing in. "The lady suggested kind of an auburn in it, and I was up for suggestions. It was kind of funny because we were all three sitting in the heated chairs like old grandmas with the rap on our head just chatting at the salon," Domenico said.

Dutmer

2. Senior Amy Dutmer is the hairstylist on the team. She said she loves to braid hair. "I like to do hair. It's just something from when I was younger. I used to always do my own hair and then my cousin taught me how to French braid when I was in grade school," she said. "In high school I used to do my friends' hair for games, and it's just something I like to do. I like to try designs, but it usually takes me longer."

Koehn

3.Mahoney rooms with Laurie Koehn, Nicole Ohlde and Wecker described Mahoney's shopping techniques as a little weird. "If we go to the store, like Wal-Mart, if she wants to buy something, she won't take the first one. She has to take the second thing, and that drives me nuts," Wecker said. "She just can't handle taking the first one. I don't know, it's probably some disorder you could probably look that up. Like if she wants to get a gallon of milk, she won't take the first one. She'll dig and dig and take the second one."

Mahoney

4.Wecker and Mahoney are often confused with one another because of their looks, but Wecker said it might not happen so often now that her hair is a different color. "We'll go to Wal-Mart, and this still happens now — people ask if we are twins," Wecker said. "When we say no, they'll say 'well you surely have to be sisters.' Wal-Mart is usually the hot place. It always happens at Wal-Mart."

Ohlde

5.One of the men on the practice team stole the fish that lives with Ohlde, Wecker, Mahoney and Koehn, so nine of the women waited outside Wal-Mart until he got off work and kidnapped him. They threw a sheet over his head and duct taped him, and it literally took all of the girls to get him in the car.

Cyclones need perfect game to beat Cats

K-State women return home after 2-game road trip, work toward Big 12 title

By Louie Novak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With three games remaining in the 2003-04 regular season, the No. 9 women's basketball team hosts Iowa State at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State enters the final stretch winners of last eight games and holds a one-game lead over Texas (23-3, 11-2), whom the Wildcats will face Sunday in Austin, Texas.

The Wildcats return home after an two game road trip, which included a 59-56 triumph over Texas A&M in College Station and a 93-90 double-overtime win against Missouri in Columbia.

With the big showdown against Texas only six days away, the Cats know they can't look past an Iowa State team that stands at 13-11 overall and 6-7 in Big 12 play.

The Cyclones have won three straight games, and are coming off a 77-66 win over Nebraska on Saturday.

ISU shot 48.1 percent from the floor and 45 percent from 3-point range while committing just eight turnovers in the game, the fewest of the season.

Iowa State will need a similar performance this week if hopes to defeat a Wildcat team that is 10-0 at home and has won 29 consecutive regular season games in Bramlage Coliseum.

The game Wednesday will be a rematch of the Feb. 4 meeting when K-State used a second-half run to defeat Iowa State, 61-47.

Senior center Nicole Ohlde, who will play her final regular season home game Wednesday, scored 20 points, and freshman guard Twiggy McIntyre chipped in 13 as the Cats' 17-0 run propelled the team to victory over the stubborn Cyclones.

Iowa State led 40-33 early in the second half of the game, and seemed to be in control with K-State struggling on offense.

However, K-State turned up its defense and held Iowa State to just one field goal the rest of the way as the Cats escaped Ames with a hard-fought win.

The difference between the Cyclones winning and losing this year has been their production from behind the arc.

When Iowa State wins, the team averages 75.9 ppg and makes 40.0 percent of its 3-point attempts.

However, when they lose the Cyclones produce only 55.4 ppg and shoot 28.6 percent from 3-point range.

Of the Cyclones' shot attempts, 36.6 percent are from downtown. Nine Cyclones see action a game for ISU, and of those nine only one has not made a three this season.

ISU will also look for offensive production against K-State.

When Iowa State wins, four Cyclones average nine or more points, but in losses only one Cyclone averages nine or more a game.

The Big 12 regular season title is K-State's to lose, but the Wildcats can't overlook an Iowa State team geared for an upset.

Final games have potential to decide post-season play

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As March Madness approaches, Big 12 teams are quickly separating into three categories.

There are those teams – Oklahoma State and Texas, among others – who need only to worry about their NCAA tournament seeding, not whether they will get in.

Then there are Baylor and Texas A&M, with the Bears having no chance at post-season play due to probation and the Aggies needing an improbable Big 12 Tournament win to continue playing in late March. In the middle of these two classes lies the majority of the Big 12.

This includes K-State, whose chances are better at playing in the "other" post-season tournament – the National Invitational Tournament.

With only a handful of games remaining, many teams continue to work on their résumés hoping to impress the NCAA tournament selection committee.

Will their "bubbles" be floating to the top, or sinking to the bottom of college basketball obscurity? – only time will tell.

Baylor, Texas A&M: no chance.

No. 6 Oklahoma State, No. 10 Texas, No. 20 Kansas: sitting pretty.

No. 25 Texas Tech: In, barring collapse.

Texan coach helps Wildcats against Longhorns

K-State assistant coach Kamie Ethridge played college basketball for the University of Texas. Ethridge had a standout career as a Longhorn, which earned her a spot in the Women's Basketball Hall of Fame in 2002.

Saturday's game against No. 1 Texas will be full of emotion for K-State, including Coach Kamie Ethridge who has ties with the university from when she was a player.

The K-State associate head coach played for the Longhorns from 1982-86, and in that time went on to win a National Championship and, went to the Elite Eight twice.

During her senior season, Ethridge was the team captain of the national championship team and earned MVP honors in the title game. The Longhorns went 34-0 in 1986, the first perfect NCAA Division I season in history.

Also in her senior season, Ethridge won the Wade Trophy, the Broderick Cup given to the top female athlete in the country, and the Frances Pomeroy Naismith Player of the Year award, given to the best senior under 5-foot-6.

In 1988, Ethridge was a member of the Olympic team that won the gold medal in Seoul, Korea. She also represented the United States on the gold medal winning 1986 Goodwill Games, 1986 World Championship and the 1987 Pan-Am Games teams.

Topping off Ethridge's accolades, she was inducted into Texas Women's Athletic Hall of Fame in 2000, followed by an induction into the Women's Basketball Hall of Fame in 2002.

Now in her eighth year on the Wildcat staff, Ethridge has seen the K-State program built into one of the nation's best, with four post-season appearances in seven years.

K-State men look for 2nd road win; Hart questionable

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Jeremiah Massey jumps for a rebound against Colorado's David Harrison and Chris Copeland in the first half of Saturday's game. The Wildcats travel to Ames, Iowa, on Wednesday to take on an Iowa State team that K-State dominated Feb. 11 at Bramlage Coliseum.

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State travels to Iowa State on Wednesday in search of its second straight road win, the Wildcats could be without one of their senior leaders.

Senior guard Jarrett Hart continues to battle a hip injury sustained in the Wildcats' Feb. 18 victory over Nebraska.

"The injury thing has crept up again, and it comes at the worst time," Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

Hart – the Wildcats' third-leading scorer at 11 points per game – was noticeably hampered by the hip throughout Saturday's 72-62 home loss to Colorado, scoring just five points on 2-of-8 shooting.

Wooldridge said Hart's injury was a reason the K-State offense struggled for most of the game.

"It was a factor in how we played as a team," Wooldridge said.

On Monday, Wooldridge would not comment on Hart's status for Wednesday's game.

K-State (12-11, 4-8) stumbles into Ames, Iowa, after Saturday's loss that saw the Wildcats get outrebounded 40-31 and fail to find a stable offensive rhythm.

A return to the form of their first Iowa State matchup could be the perfect solution for K-State in those two areas in which they struggled.

On Feb. 11, K-State thrashed the Cyclones 90-59 in Manhattan, with the Wildcats excelling on the offensive and defensive ends of the floor and winning the battle of the boards 40-32.

Iowa State (14-9, 5-7) would not only like to make that loss a distant memory, but

Wecker plays with heart through injury

Junior forward Kendra Wecker truly has it.

Heart.

Talking about an athlete's desire to compete more than about human anatomy, the word is heard and said by anyone from coaches to players to fans,

NABIL SHAHEEN

Cliché? Probably.

But does Wecker have a heart the size of Kansas?

Absolutely.

What fans have seen in the past month from Wecker is remarkable considering she has been playing in pain.

I'm not talking about the kind of pain that comes with playing any Division I basketball game for a full 40 minutes, which she has done twice in the past three weeks.

I'm not talking about the occasional nicks, bruises, cuts or floor burns that come with being intense in the post.

I'm talking about the excruciating kind of pain where she can't even practice – which she couldn't do all last week.

Where migraine headaches are so bad all she can do is rest and hope for the best.

Perhaps most impressive is that Wecker has yet to miss a game – ever.

Since the first time she was fitted for a Wildcat uniform as a scrawny K-Sate freshman (let's not kid ourselves with the word "scrawny." Her stature was impressive even as a freshman.), she has started every game.

That's 92 straight times to this day.

After the University of Oklahoma game Jan. 31, a "Three-fifths" Wecker, as Coach Deb Patterson would describe her, grabbed nine rebounds and scored two points.

One of those pesky journalists asked Wecker how she was feeling.

"Not as well as I'd like to be feeling, but I can't complain right now," Wecker said.

She very well could have complained.

It's all about heart.

Coach P., as her players like to call her, thought a little differently of her star forward's effort that night and that week.

"What we're seeing with Kendra the last couple of games is an absolute gladiator mentality," Patterson said. "She's fighting hard and competing in pain, she is finding a way to impact the game, she's playing like an All-American."

About a week later, Wecker smiled when she heard how her coach described her play.

"It's just something that I think I've learned that I need to deal with because it's not getting a whole lot better," she said. "It's just something I need to play through every day.

"It's kind of a mind set that you're out there to do your job and get your job done. Anything extra you have to deal with needs to get thrown out of the picture."

The injury remains undisclosed, but the desire to play the game she loves continues.

It's all about heart.

Wildcats face dangerous Tiger team

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Missouri Tigers are peaking at the right time.

Since losing to Nebraska Feb. 7, the Tigers (13-10, 7-5) have won three conference games in a row and are tied for fourth place in the Big 12 going into their last four games of the season.

Missouri's last four games, however, will be the toughest stretch of the season, facing three top-25 teams. The Tigers will face No. 6 Oklahoma State, K-State, No. 25 Texas Tech and No. 20 Kansas to finish the regular season.

The Tigers defense has held its last three conference opponents to 44 percent from the field and have outrebounded its last two opponents by an average of 14 rebounds.

"They've got a lot of weapons and they present some tough matchups for us," Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

Conley is averaging 17 points a contest and is shooting a blistering 61 percent from the field. He has also been on fire from behind the 3-point line, shooting 52 percent.

"It's been a steady progression for him. He's just a good player that gives us some punch off of the bench," Missouri Coach Quin Snyder said.

Missouri's seniors also have been a factor for the Tigers.

Guard Rickey Paulding is averaging 15 points a game on just 37 percent shooting, and center Arthur Johnson is averaging 14 points and seven rebounds a game.

"Arthur Johnson has a lot of experience and we always knew they had other players that would eventually step up," Wooldridge said.

In the first game of the season series Missouri defeated K-State 62-53 Jan. 31, at the Hearnes Center in Columbia, Mo. Freshman guard Thomas Gardner torched the Wildcats for 16 points shooting 5-of-11 from the floor, including 3-of-6 from behind the arc and Johnson added 13 points and seven rebounds in the win.

Wooldridge said the Tigers were a dangerous team.

"They are physical, and they're big. They've got an inside game with Arthur Johnson and a perimeter game to go along with it," he said.

"They're a team that can beat anybody on any given night."

The Wildcats have lost six in a row to Missouri, with the last win coming at Bramlage Coliseum on Jan. 16, 2001.

Ready for attack

Tim Ellis, aka Spider-man, leads men's team with explosive energy, dedicated work ethic

By Andi Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Like a spider, Tim Ellis is calm, cool and collected until the opening tip when it is time to attack his prey.

The 6-foot-4 guard, who transferred from Southern Idaho junior college a year ago, acquired the nickname "spider-man" in high school from announcer, and it has stuck with him ever since.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Tim Ellis tries to grab a rebound from Colorado's Lamar Harris during the second half of Saturday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. Ellis has been key for the Wildcats recently, highlighted by a 25-point performance against Nebraska.

"Tim's really had a good year, he's been really consistent in a lot of ways," associate head coach Mike Miller said.

"A year ago he really relied on his jump shot, and this year he's really run the floor. He's got some easy baskets in transition. He's gotten offensive rebounds. He's scored coming off of screens. He's added a lot more to his game, and it's made him a lot more complete offensive player."

In his second year at K-State, Ellis has improved his statistics in almost every category, including field-goals, 3 point shooting percentage, rebounding, assists and steals.

One of Ellis' top performances came against Nebraska in Lincoln, when he tipped in the winning basket with 2.6 seconds remaining, snapping a 21-game road losing streak. He tied his career-high of 25 points against the Huskers.

"We fought so hard to see this day, and now it's finally here," Ellis said.

"That big gorilla was getting heavy! I'm glad he's gone, but we can't be satisfied with just this one win."

Despite being in double-figures in the last six games, Ellis said his performance could be better.

"It could be better in rebounding, better defense," Ellis said.

"Just better things that would make our team win, it doesn't work individual wise, if your team is losing."

Senior guard Jarrett Hart said Ellis' numbers have improved because he has become comfortable in the offense.

He also said that one primary asset the program gets from Ellis is his defense.

"Defensively, he's usually matched up with one of the best people on any team we play," Hart said. "He just stops one of the best players on any team defensively.

One of his best defensive games came against Texas A&M, when he held All-America candidate Antoine Write to just two points.

Hart said that Ellis is also a big key in showing the younger players how to play in the Big 12.

"He just works hard. He plays the same way he practices and that's a big key," Hart said.

"He's one of those guys that has to be going full speed all the time. He's our energy guy, he brings energy to the team he rebounds, he does little things on defense, and just everything it takes.

"People feed off that, and we need that with this team because we've got a lot of young guys that don't know how to play or what pace to play at and he's showing them."

Ellis said the season so far is almost a repeat of last year.

"It is kind of frustrating because you went through the whole thing last year, and it's like repeating yourself all over again," he said.

"You want to tell yourself 'OK, we can get better next season,' but unfortunately, this is my last year, and a couple of the other guys', too. You just want to do as good as you can and make a better outcome of the season."

also its most recent defeat.

On Saturday, after battling back from a 17-point deficit, Iowa State fell by one point in overtime at No. 20 Kansas 90-89.

"This is one of the most draining losses I have ever had," Iowa State senior guard Jake Sullivan told the Associated Press after the game.

Unfortunately for the Wildcats, teams traveling to play the Cyclones have rarely come away with a victory.

Iowa State is a near-perfect 13-1 at Hilton Coliseum this season with its lone loss to the No. 6 Oklahoma State Cowboys.

With the possibility of Hart's absence looming, the Wildcats' top scorers will be looked upon to step up and compensate.

Junior forward Jeremiah Massey leads the team with 14.5 points and eight rebounds a game, and took the leading role in the K-State offense on Saturday.

Massey led all scorers with 23 points in the contest and added 11 rebounds.

Senior guard Tim Ellis also come into the game on a roll, scoring in double-figures in each of his last six games averaging 20 points and shooting a blistering 64 percent during that stretch.

If Hart cannot play against Iowa State his play and leadership will be missed. "He has been a catalyst for our team coming together," Wooldridge said.

They are followed by 6-1 senior Stacy Stephens (12 ppg), 5-6 junior guard Jamie Carey (11), 5-8 sophomore guard Nina Norman (9.2) and 6-2 junior Kala Bowers (8.6).

Texas is the only women's basketball program to have three players listed as National Player of the Year candidates.

All three are finalists for national honors.

Senior 6-1 post Stacy Stephens, 6-2 junior forward Heather Schreiber and 5-6 senior guard Jamie Carey are Texas' All-America and National Player of the Year candidates and will be the focus of the Wildcat defense.

The last time these two teams faced each other was Jan. 25 2003. K-State defeated the Longhorns 71-69 behind Wecker's 27 points and 11 rebounds.

Bush lends support to marriage amendment

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President George W. Bush formally has weighed in on the hot election issue of same-sex marriages.

In his speech, Bush backed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution formally defining marriage as a "union between a man and a woman."

Bush
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

A similar piece of legislation introduced to the U.S. House of Representatives in 2003 was co-sponsored by Rep. Jim Ryun, R-Kan., who represents the second district, in which Manhattan lies.

Ryun's office released a statement Tuesday commending the president.

According to the statement, Bush should be applauded for his "stance on the definition of marriage and his support for the American people."

"An overwhelming majority of Americans believe in the sanctity of marriage, and believe that it should be defined as a union between one man and one woman," Ryun said in the statement.

He said he believes, across the nation, the "institution of marriage is being is under attack."

Bush softened his announcement by leaving the door open for states to legalize civil unions, which gay rights groups say is an

Enrollment decreases by 1 percent

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time in four years, K-State's spring enrollment has not increased. In fact, it has decreased from 20,635 in spring 2003 to 20,490 this semester.

The decrease is about 1 percent, said Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement.

Bosco said the decrease, which he called miniscule, could be a result of slowed economy, increased tuition and tougher academic policies, specifically in the College of Engineering.

"K-State enrollments are always complex," he said. "Anything that happens economically in the state can have a positive or negative affect on enrollments.

"Tuition increases and the economy – the amount of real jobs available – could be dinging us this spring semester. We've not had this (decrease), as small as it is, we've not had it."

The overall decrease envelopes the drop in K-State-Salina students from 862 in spring 2003 to 813 this semester, as well as the enrollment of students in the Division of Continuing Education, which Bosco said remained the same from last spring.

"We've enjoyed years of modest increases from spring to spring, and this spring that wasn't the case," he said.

University of Colorado football coach Gary Barnett walks away from a news conference after being placed on paid administrative leave in Boulder, Colo., Feb. 18. The university placed Barnett on administrative leave after he criticized the on-field performance of a player who said she was raped by a teammate. The aftermath of the developments have made officials throughout the Big 12 Conference and the nation look in depth at recruiting practices.

Colorado scandal sparks scrutiny of Big 12

By Josh Witt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In recent weeks, publicity has not been an issue for the Big 12 Conference.

However, the recent attention has nothing to do with the red-hot play of the Oklahoma State men's and K-State women's basketball teams.

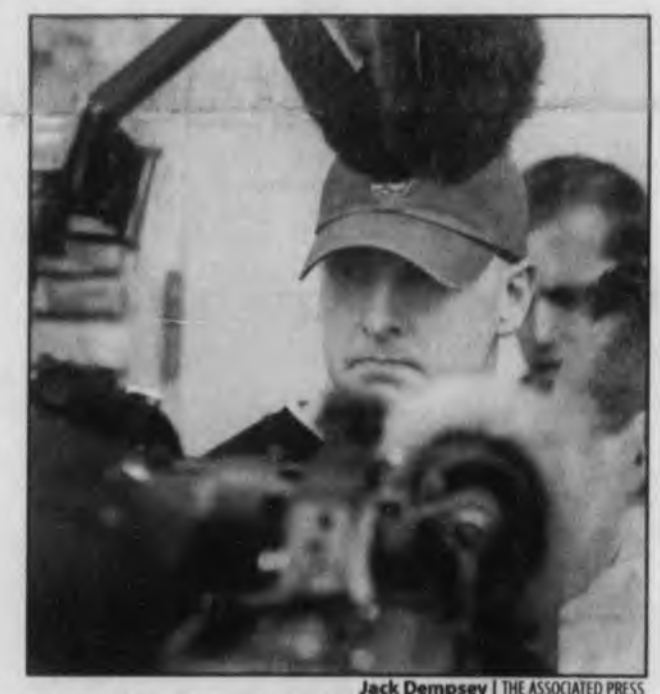
Barbara Meyer thinks K-State needs to reform athletic policies.

Scandal has rocked the University of Colorado football program, with allegations of sexual misconduct and unethical recruiting methods marring the school's reputation.



The highly publicized controversy has caused a ripple effect across the Big 12 and universities across the nation.

"Any time you have these kind of events, you're obviously very concerned," Big 12 Commissioner Kevin Weiberg said.

Six sexual assault allegations have been leveled against Colorado's football program, with Coach Gary Barnett being placed on leave, as the university investigates his handling of alleged improprieties, including the use of sex to lure recruits.

"We've never seen anything quite like this in terms of the total number of allegations," Weiberg said. "These are things I haven't seen in my

The passion
"The Passion of the Christ" officially opens in 2,800 theaters today, Ash Wednesday in the traditional church calendar, after months of intense interfaith debate over its portrayal of Jews. Already, church groups anxious to get a peek at Gibson's crucifixion epic have been seeing the film in private showings.

War crimes
The Pentagon brought war crimes conspiracy charges against two men, Ibrahim Ahmed Mahmoud al Qosi and Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al Bahlul, who are allegedly associates of Osama bin Laden. The men will face the first U.S. military tribunals since World War II. Prosecutors ruled out seeking the death penalty.

It's Kerry
Democratic presidential front-runner John Kerry scored solid victories in the Idaho caucuses and Utah primaries Tuesday, and looked for more good fortune in the Hawaii contest, the last before a climactic 10-state round next week.

Earthquake
A powerful earthquake devastated an isolated region of northern Morocco, killing more than 560 people as they slept, injuring hundreds more and laying ruin to villages that suffered for decades under government neglect. Rescuers with pick axes and dogs were searching for survivors.

CAMPUS CHRONICLES

HEADLINES FROM THE NATION'S UNIVERSITIES

Colleges' offer introduction to gambling classes

SYRACUSE, N.Y. – Imagine going to class where instead of clocks against the wall, there are slot machines. Instead of desks to hold your books, there are tables to stack your chips.

Instead of your teachers dressed in suits or sweaters, they are dressed in bow ties and silk vests. And the best part is, you earn an academic degree in one of the most profitable businesses in America.

Welcome to Casino Gambling 101.

Some colleges across the country already have started rolling the dice. Michigan State University, Tulane University and the University of Massachusetts are just a few colleges offering classes in casino studies.

The University of Nevada offers a major in gaming management. According to the University's Web site, faculty is recruited from the gaming industry and academic institutions.

PAPERCLIP RECORD

DAVIS, Calif. – After a grueling marathon session, University of California-Davis graduate student Dan Meyer broke the world record for the longest paperclip chain made by an individual in 24 hours.

Before it was done, his fingers were silvery and "in really bad shape" from chaining more than 40,000 paperclips together.

However, the 21-year-old said he "wasn't tired, (just) relieved" that he had topped the previous world record by almost 2,500 feet with a 5,340-foot paperclip chain.

BIG BROTHER

NORMAN, Okla. – Some University of Oklahoma students say they are uncomfortable with cameras in the dorms, and with the amount of information they have been given about them.

The presence of cameras at undisclosed locations is an invasion of privacy, Jennifer Fischer, sophomore in business, said.

Cameras are present in many public areas within the residence halls and food facilities, said Amy Davenport, director of Housing and Food Services.

She said they were installed in the early to mid-1990s, and they are updated as technology advances. She was not sure of the most recent update.

"They aid Housing and Food Services as well as OUPD in providing a safer, more secure environment. ... Disclosure of specific locations is not appropriate, as it could jeopardize our efforts of providing a safer, more secure living environment," she said.

Davenport said she could not discuss if the cameras are installed in other devices, such as fire alarms, for security reasons.

Commission discusses mall sale

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City Commissioners on Tuesday officially tackled an issue that had been developing for some time – the potential sale of Manhattan Town Center.

At the work session, Commissioners discussed the transfer of mall ownership from Manhattan Mall Associates, LLP and JC Penny Co. to Manhattan Town Center Development Group. MTC Development Group is a newly formed Limited Liability Corporation consisting of DRW Capital and North Shore Properties, Commissioner Bruce Snead said.

Because the city owns the land the mall is on, Snead said, any transfer for ownership requires Commission's approval.

Jim Hansen, the senior vice president and regional manager of Urban Retail Properties, Co., which is the company that would be managing the property, said Manhattan Town Center is a premier mall in its category.

"It's a very attractive property," Hansen said. "I was not expecting that level of architecture in a community of this size."

Commissioner Ed Klimek expressed a concern MTC Development Group might only be interested in the location as an asset to be sold at a later date at a large profit.

"This is totally, as we sit here, a long term hold," said Max Reiswerg, principal of The North Shore Properties Group. "We have no plans to sell."

Mayor Mark Taussig said his concern was with the mall's upkeep because the company is located in Chicago and does not have local ties.

"It is part of our home, and we want to keep it beautiful," Taussig said.

Snead said he would also like to make sure the mall maintained its prominence throughout the Downtown Redevelopment Project.

"Manhattan Town Center is an appropriate name," Snead said.

"It was built to rejuvenate downtown. It's not a corn-field mall."

Steven Weiss, also a principal for The North Shore Properties Group, said the city should not worry about ulterior motives of the purchasing group because any benefit for the company would benefit the city.

"This is an overall partnership," Weiss said.

"What benefits the city, benefits us as well."

Hansen said there was no interest in neglecting the maintenance in favor of the bottom line because that action would decrease the company's profits.

"It's not all about the bottom line, but it is way up there," he said.

Adult business zoning considered

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students waiting for a porn shop might get their wish.

City Commissioners considered zoning and licensing requirements for adult businesses in the city of Manhattan at their work session on Tuesday.

Katie Jackson, assistant city attorney, recommended a list of criteria that would define an adult business. If Commission determines a business meets the criteria, it would be restricted accordingly.

Jackson also suggested areas of the community that need protection from the effects of adult businesses. Included in these protected entities are schools, residential areas, other adult businesses, streets designated as arterial streets and public buildings.

Courts around the country have upheld ordinances allowing adult businesses to build anywhere from 1 to 5 percent of the total land in a city. This percentage of land must be reasonably open to development.

The proposal would zone about 2 percent of the city's land for adult businesses.

City Attorney William Frost and Jackson both said it was important to draft the ordinance so it ensured adult businesses could be successful.

"Obviously we want to make it as restrictive as possible to protect the community," Frost said. "But we cannot cross that line."

Frost said he had been a proponent of the ordinance for a long time, but wanted to make sure it would be enforceable in court.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said he wanted to restrict and limit the businesses as much as possible.

"Let's try to find a magic number to get the percentage down to about 1 percent," Klimek said.

Jackson said there was no guarantee a court would uphold a percentage that low.

Mayor Mark Taussig agreed with Klimek, even advocating the addition of McCall Road to the list of arterial roads, which would significantly decrease the amount of available land.

"I think it would be terrible for an adult business to pop up next to the Super Wal-Mart or in that retail development," Taussig said.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said it was necessary to balance the rights of the business owners with the those of the community.

"We have to reach a balance between enabling and protecting," he said.

Taussig said adult businesses coming to Manhattan is not an idea he likes.

"It's unfortunate that we have to do any of this at all," he said.

The proposal will go to legislative session in late March or early April.

Did you know?
Adult businesses

Katie Jackson, assistant city attorney, proposed the following criteria for determining an adult business.

- Adult materials are 25 percent or more of the total inventory
- Adult materials are 25 percent or more of the dollar value of the inventory
- Adult materials are displayed on 25 percent or more of the sales-floor area
- The establishment advertises itself as an adult business
- The establishment does not physically and visually separate adult material from other business purposes, or if a reasonable person would identify the establishment as an adult business

Ferrell, Ingebretson enter race

SGA ELECTIONS

By Kent Hildebrand
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body Presidential candidate Jonathan Ferrell, sophomore in political science and vice presidential candidate Greg Ingebretson, sophomore in criminal justice, will be on the March 3 ballot.

Zach Long
COLLEGIAN

Jonathan Ferrell and Greg Ingebretson promise to bring a lighter side to this year's student body presidential race.

Running on a platform consisting of horizontal escalators instead of campus sidewalks and a giant squirrel hunt and barbecue as a fundraiser, the pair brings a variety of new ideas.

"We're pretty laid back and not taking things too seriously," Ferrell, sophomore in political science, said.

"We're just seeing what we can do for the everyday student to make this place a little better."

Ferrell said their campaign offers students something different.

Campaigning with the slogan "A vote for us is a vote for you," Ferrell, resident assistant in Moore Hall, said he believes their new perspective is what students want.

"We're fresh faces," he said. "We're just normal students with pretty darn good ideas."

One of the pair's ideas is a four-floor addition to West Hall.

"We want to make it normal size so it doesn't feel like the short dorm anymore," Ferrell said.

They also want to build horizontal escalators that will be heated and covered.

These moving sidewalks will allow students to go to class without walking or enduring the elements.

Next, they plan to make meal plan cards from the dining center usable in the Union Food Court and install a 24-hour Chipotle.

"We want to use meal cards all over campus like other universities," Ingebretson said.

Other plans include giving an A to every student each semester to bolster GPAs and extending fall break for a full week.

"We'll think of more when we get elected," Ferrell said.

The pair also has some ideas for funding their initiatives and combating tuition hikes.

First, over the weekends they plan to rent out President Jon Wefald's on-campus house for banquets.

"We're kind of afraid PETA might be after us on that one, but it's all fair in politics," Ferrell said.

Ferrell said he expects to use a low-budget campaign during the race.

"It will be a grass-roots effort," he said.

"We'll use word-of-mouth to get the word out from friend to friend," Ingebretson said.

"We're not real wealthy. "Hopefully, we have lots of friends."

Bad practice

Big 12 should learn from Colorado

With allegations of rape, harassment and worse surrounding the University of Colorado's football team, it's time to take a step back and examine our own athletics program.

BARBARA MEYER

The possibility the corruption at Colorado is an isolated affair simply does not exist. If Gary Barnett felt he had to look the other way to rape allegations, other coaches do too.

That includes coaches Bill Snyder, James Wooldridge and others here on campus.

While Colorado reaps the consequences of bad policies, the athletics department at K-State works on its own reputation.

At this point, it's mostly concerned with perpetual tardiness and minor infractions of the law, such as committing gang robberies in the back alleys of Aggieville.

If the incident occurring at the Fiesta Bowl wasn't enough to make our school officials sit up and take notice, Colorado's situation should.

It's true athletic excellence takes a lot of talent, time and dedication.

But so does everything else in life.

Athletes are not above the law, nor should they be above the same rules and academic standards governing other students.

Unfortunately, the dynamics of modern spectator sports have created an atmosphere where hero worship and the promise of outrageous salaries allow collegiate athletes to live in a privileged class.

It reminds me of another privileged class that used to exist in France. Once everyone realized what a load of crap that system was, the common people rebelled, and the aristocrats had their heads chopped off.

Of course, those are pretty drastic measures, but I'm guessing the six women who made rape allegations wouldn't think so.

There is something wrong when coaches, professors and administrators give preference to athletics over academics.

Universities, by their very nature, should be concerned with education, not with building a football team to rival neighboring universities. Unless, of course, our football team is going to go marauding and bring back trophy professors and top scholars from other schools.

There are the usual justifications for the scholarships, free tutoring and other privileges: the football players bring lots of money to the university, sports programs increase enrollment, athletes aren't allowed to work.

Those are bull.

The money brought in by the athletic program, by and large, stays there.

And do you really think parents are standing in line to send their little girls to Colorado now?

As for work, according to the College Board, 54 percent of full-time students get by without a job.

Football players can take out loans like everyone else.

Additionally, the $8,481 scholarship Ell Roberson would have received for the spring semester was nearly double the amount the university estimates students will actually spend on housing and tuition.

And it's $5,481 more per semester than the largest academic award offered by the university, the Putnam Scholarship.

What's particularly ironic is the players receiving those scholarships are the most likely to score multimillion-dollar contracts, making them the most capable of repaying student loans in the future.

The players who don't make it to the pros are looking at a hard road.

Especially considering 43 percent of football scholarship winners don't leave K-State with a degree.

We have some great athletes here at K-State, but we also have a system that encourages professors and other students to look the other way.

Making exceptions for athletes gives them leave to terrorize other students and disrupt class. Rather than fostering a healthy extracurricular activity, we are creating an environment where cheating, harassment and disruptions go unchecked.

We've left the door wide open for the kinds of abuse already happening in Colorado.

It's time to remember football and basketball are not majors.

Colorado's situation shows us changes need to be made across the board regarding college sports.

Let's not wait until we look like total morons.

TO THE POINT

Amendment defining marriage promotes further discrimination of minority groups

The constitutional amendments are in place to protect minority groups.

However, a proposal by President Bush for a new amendment persecutes them.

Bush announced Tuesday his support for an amendment that would define marriage as a union between a man and woman, essentially banning gay marriage.

This amendment would set a dangerous precedent for future additions to the Constitution and steers far from the principles upon which this country was founded.

The amendments protect against discrimination for race, gender and age – why then are we proposing an amendment that promotes discrimination of homosexuals?

Democracy is about giving everyone a voice and guaranteeing rights, not limiting them.

If Congressmen follow Bush's lead, they will guide the country down a road away from the core of American values using the most sacred document as their vehicle.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Students provide challenges for aspiring teacher

It takes a lot of courage to deal with high-maintenance students. In my eighth week student teaching at Blue Valley Northwest High School, I have figured this out.

PAUL RESTIVO

I call them high-maintenance students, not bad students.

They are high-maintenance because they won't turn in their homework unless I remind them several times an hour. They are the students who won't make up tests until I call their parents.

Then there is the other boy who refuses to get out of his seat to throw away trash.

I'll set up this scene for you.

He sits by the door. The trash can is by my desk, at least 20 feet away. I have seen pencils, pens, bottles, paper wads, newspapers, books – all kinds of things being hurled across Room 902.

The boy is a lousy shot, which means I play Deffenbaugh Restivo five days a week.

But one boy in particular has grabbed my attention. I'll call him Tom.

I formally met Tom when he started coming to class regularly – some time after progress reports were released at week four. At that point in the semester, Tom had a 3 percent. Yes, a 3. Mind you, all seniors need this English credit to graduate.

Tom wasn't looking so good.

I called his mom while she was on her lunch break. It should be noted that my cooperating teacher made me role play with him before doing so.

"OK, OK, so I'm Tom's mom, and you're Mr. Restivo. Be you," he said as if he enjoyed watching me go through this agony – the horrors of calling my first parent.

"Mrs. Tom's-mom, how are you? I'm Paul Restivo, Tom's English teacher. Good deal. So, uh, I'm calling because, uh, your son has a 3 percent in my class and –"

"Stop, stop, stop. You're just going to hit her with that all at once? Try again."

"Mrs. Tom's-mom. Hi, Paul Restivo here – Tom's English teacher. All right. Uh, I'm really concerned about Tom. I think that he may have a problem with –"

"Hold it. Lead with something that makes you sound caring. Again."

I found it worked better if we reversed roles and he played Mr. Restivo.

Finally, I picked up the phone and called Tom's mom. I told her the good news.

"I'm gonna kill 'im. I'm just gonna kill 'im."

Tom showed up to class the next day, much to my relief, minus a car. He was mad at me, which is understandable considering he can't drive until he has a B.

A couple weeks went by, and Tom had yet to make up a test and a 100-point writing assignment. Twice I called him after class to make this stuff up.

Twice he said "OK." Twice he stood me up.

I didn't think it was a big deal until it started keeping me up at night.

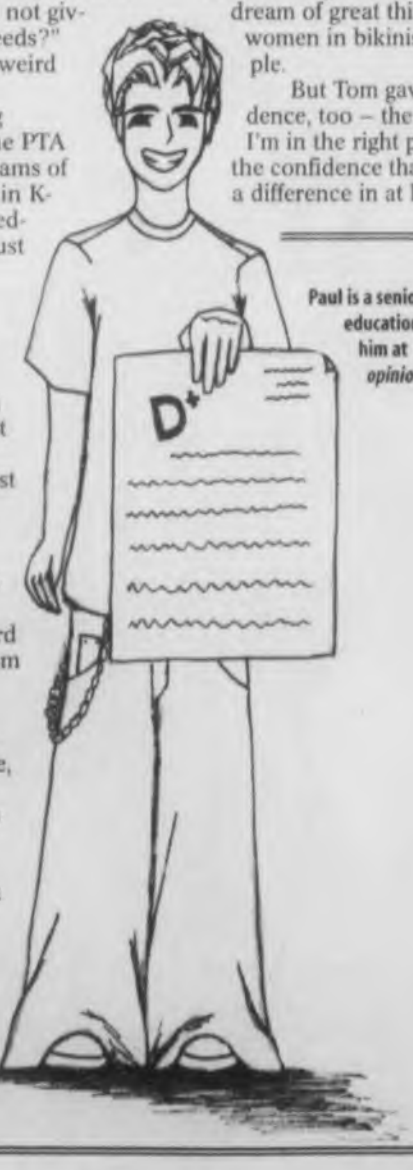
"What if this kid fails because of me? What if I'm not giving him what he needs?"

I had dreams – weird dreams.

Dreams of being gunned down by the PTA for negligence. Dreams of having to re-enroll in K-State's Block One education program. Just awful dreams.

So the next morning, I got to work. I typed up the Tom Improvement Plan. It was a two-page document showing, step-by-step, what Tom must do to improve his grade to a C by spring break.

I expected a tire slashing in retaliation, or a curse word at the very least from Tom.



Instead...

"Holy crap, Mr. Restivo. This is, like, the nicest thing a teacher's ever done for me. Thanks."

Now, a week later, Tom rests at a 50 percent – a mighty feat if you ask me.

He has his confidence back (still somewhat fueled by the absence of his car) and he attends class daily. As for me, I've gotten rid of the nightmares. Now I can dream of great things like women in bikinis or little people.

But Tom gave me confidence, too – the confidence I'm in the right profession – the confidence that I'm making a difference in at least one life.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Fourum comment too inappropriate

Editor,

The subtle, underlying tones of ignorance found in the Fourum on Monday was absolutely sickening.

It is a shame such close-mindedness runs so rampant on our campus. But what is even more sickening is the fact that the campus paper would print such a racial, ignorant statement.

Does the Collegian not represent the campus as a whole? To single out a particular group with a blatant statement of ignorance is just wrong, especially when the opinion editor stated earlier that she does not print inappropriate comments.

I could understand if this comment was just overlooked, but the Collegian did not even cover the affair held by the BSU this past weekend. This was a huge event only taking place every 12 years with hundreds of people coming to Manhattan for this convention. The paper not covering this event puts it in the same category of ignorance as the people who called in the comments to the Fourum.

The BSU is an open and friendly organization. I, being white, have felt very welcome by this group on many occasions. When they have meetings, all people, of any race, are welcome. So why must people denigrate them with such a racial insinuation?

This group, along with many others, is trying to bring something to campus K-State lacks. Diversity is a much needed aspect of our society. I would just like to say thank you to the BSU for hosting such a wonderful event at our campus.

I hope those who feel their statement was funny realize how inappropriate, crude and just plain ignorant they sounded. I further hope the Collegian takes a closer look at the comments they print in the paper.

I realize it is the person who called in the comment who is to blame. But the Collegian shares part of this blame by allowing such an improper and ill-stated comment to run in the paper.

Mickayla Fink, the belief is that life begins at conception, not pregnancy.

Can I ask whoever is vandalizing the school with the "obey" crap, would you cut it out? Thanks.

Whenever I feel empty, I don't go pray and fill myself with God. I go talk to Sam Adams, he fills me right up. It's always a good decision.

I'd just like to say that I think Kent Holle's comic "Puck" is fantastic, and his sense of humor is more sophisticated than most people on this campus can understand.

This is one of those FYI situations, but white history month is every month, and it's not the shortest month of the year.

Mickayla Fink, thank you for being the voice of reason.

This comment goes to Nasrina. I just want to thank you for putting out a fantastic article on crying. It's about time that we have somebody that gives a strong, powerful representation of women and their emotions.

To whomever is condemning girls to hell, I believe you should check your Bible. There's something in there about condemning others.

Scott Seel wrote an excellent column, but I still think Sebelius is a hag.

So, liberals are so incensed with trying to get Bush out of office that they've taken to defacing public property with stencils that say "Bush Lies." That's just stupid.

Scott Seel, you can pay my tuition next year.

Though I appreciate you guys acknowledging the accomplishments of students of color, I think it's unnecessary that you use the word "overcome." Race isn't something you overcome. It doesn't get in the way of leading others.

As long as people like Scott Seel keep thinking that college tuition hikes are necessary, and that it's somebody else's fault, except somebody here on campus, money is just going to keep draining out of the students' pockets.

Can't we all just get along? Well, besides the Democrats.

To those folks that painted the little thing outside of the military science hall — political dissent is great, but if you put it in enamel based paint on our front door step, it gets a little annoying.

The headline "Student overcomes race to lead others" is pretty racist.

Thanks for running for president again Nader. Maybe you'll steal enough votes away from the Democratic candidate to keep the moron in office another four years.

No, I'm not empty! Quit asking.

I guess the Fourth of July would be celebrating white history, wouldn't it? Also Thanksgiving, and Presidents Day.

I find it extremely offensive that anyone not involved in Campus Crusade for Christ is called empty.

Why is it funny to deface signs on campus? We pay to have those fixed, you know.

The article on four-star hang-overs, I got that e-mail less than two months ago. It's nice to know the Collegian just copies from e-mails.

To the person wondering when white history month is — that would be every month except February.

So Louie Novak never picks K-State, and ironically he has the worst record of everybody.

If you want to be conservative, go to Texas.

Every time a girl goes home with a guy in a polo, chivalry dies a little bit more.

White history month is every month, so that's the answer to your question.

All liberals need to be sent to a deserted island.

It's all fun and games until someone gives you a courtesy thrust.

What's with all the trash all over campus? Don't we have enough trash cans outside? Or are people just too lazy to throw their stuff away?

My Cox never stays up for very long. They always have to go and repair it.

Today, I water plants at Derb. Tomorrow, I'll control the world.

The point isn't supposed to be whether Jesus is like a Democrat or a Republican. The point is supposed to be whether Republicans or Democrats are like Jesus.

Listen to ska — it's the official music of ADD.

To quote Pink Floyd, "bring the boys back home."

People are a lot like Slinkies: not good for much, but you can't help but laugh when they fall down stairs.

Is it wrong that I'm aroused by the ads in the Collegian?

K-State Online? More like K-State off-line.

I'll admit it, I'm a Pi Phi groupie.

What happens if you get scared half to death twice?

The RNC and the DNC are both political neoplasms that have metastasized into every organ of our government and society.

Voters should welcome Nader

Editor,

I do not understand all the backlash Ralph Nader is receiving due to his decision to run for president.

In response to Monday's "To the Point," Nader is under no obligation to support the Democrats' nominee. If he was, he would be a Democrat.

With both parties sounding increasingly more alike, and taking money from the same self-interested corporations, Nader is a breath of fresh air.

As liberal as the Democrats claim to be, they are surely on the right side of most issues. Nader knows he's not going to win, but that doesn't mean this endeavor is completely futile.

Last election, Nader collected 2.7 percent of the votes. If he gets 5 percent this time, he'll get federal funding and be allowed to debate with future Republican and Democratic candidates. Nader will force candidates to address seldomly acknowledged issues.

Most people who vote for Nader wouldn't have voted otherwise. So let's welcome this pioneer into our political system.

Nader gives more people a reason to vote under views the Democrats do not have.

Please don't bash Nader for giving more Americans a voice.

Foreman too old for boxing

NABIL SHAHEEN

To: Mr. George Foreman
From: Disturbed in Manhattan
Subject: What the hell?

Georgie boy,

First, let me thank you again for changing my life by knocking the fat out of anything I grill. From cheese sandwiches to toasted bread to hot dogs, that grill of yours is something else.

And how does it do all of that in no more than seven minutes? Unbelievable.

But, Mr. Foreman, that's not why I am writing you this letter. I am writing you inquiring about your silly announcement last week that, at the ripe-old age of 55 and the not-so-fit weight of 275 pounds, you intend to come back to boxing.

Why George, why?

Don King ("If he's here, then who's running hell") said he has offered you $20 million to return. He, like you, apparently wants to celebrate the 30th anniversary of your Rumble in the Jungle with Muhammad Ali, which was the first match King ever promoted.

I don't think you are doing this for financial reasons, as you have plenty of money laying around and continue bringing it in.

You've got a new clothing line coming out, you've got some sort of inspirational/ gospel CD already, and the Salton Corp. can't believe how much money it continues to make off that $136 million signature of yours on its grills.

You've won Olympic gold, and you've won WBC gold. My main man Ali kind of ruined that whole thing for you.

But you got that title back eventually, and in 1995, the 20-year anniversary of your epic battle with Ali, you got it back again as the oldest heavyweight champion ever.

Even then my jaw dropped – you were 45.

The previous record was 37.

Yes, I realize there are people in their 40s playing basketball, baseball and even football, but those sports aren't nearly as punishing or ruthless as boxing always has been.

You have 10 children today, Mr. Foreman, and I don't know about them, but I certainly would be worried if, eight years removed from boxing, my old man wanted to get back in the ring.

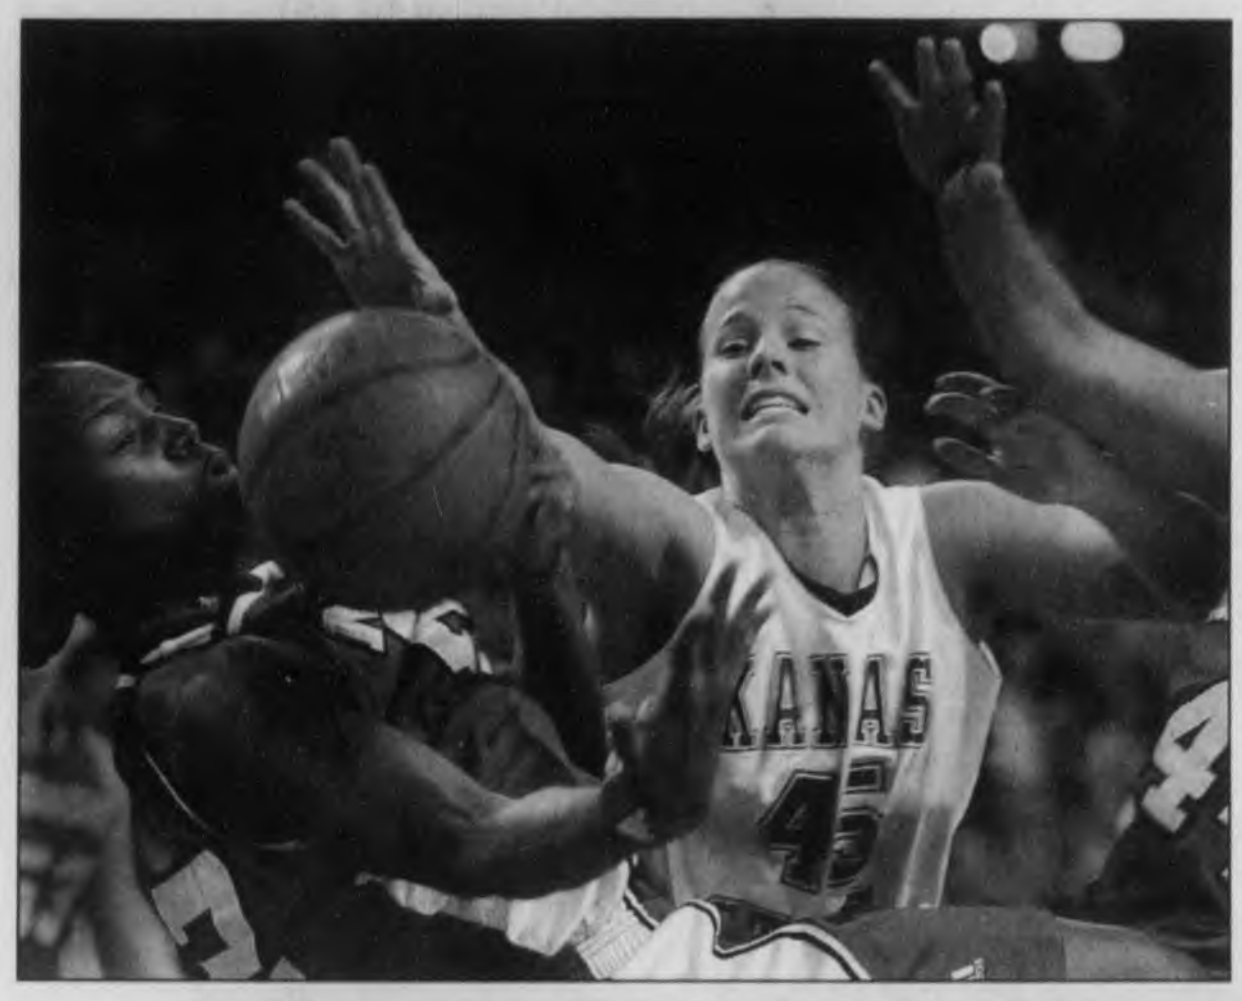
I'm sorry, Mr. Foreman, this has nothing to do with you. It just has to do with your health and knowing when to quit.

John Elway knew when to call it quits, so did Mark McGwire and Wayne Gretzky – at the top of their games, after achieving all they could.

Muhammad Ali didn't know when, neither did Joe Louis and, as much as it pains me to say, neither did Michael Jordan.

Ali did more damage to a damaged body, Louis looked pooped and Jordan, while he hung with the best of them, burned many bridges and had one of his worst seasons (although, I did find myself buying a lot of Jordan memorabilia last year).

Boxing is a wash, Mr. Foreman, and certainly has more than its fair share of sad sideshows beyond help.



I know you're out to revitalize the sport and prove to us youngsters not to fear old age, but you've already proven your successes and your worth with all you have achieved inside the ring and out of it.

You are America's favorite teddy bear and all I ask is that you please reconsider this decision and stick with knocking out the fat. Let this generation of boxers take care of the rest.

Wishing you well,
Disturbed in Manhattan

Coach Deb Patterson said she has been preparing herself for tonight's game for more than a week.

Not because of the nature of playing Iowa State or the final week of Big 12 play, but because of her three seniors being honored on their home floor.

Emotions will be running high tonight when the women's basketball team takes on the Cyclones in Bramlage Coliseum.

The game has been dubbed Senior Night, and prior to tipoff, Amy Dutmer, Kimmery Newsom and Nicole Ohlde, the three Wildcat seniors, will be honored.

"It's just going to be a real sentimental evening with Dutmer and Ohlde and Kimmery," Patterson said. "They have lived every minute of our program's emergence into a national power, and they've been an integral part of the success that we've achieved."

The three have been the nucleus of one of the most successful four-year runs in K-State history, amassing a record of 88-32.

Ohlde's career has been well-documented by those within the Big 12 and across the country. She leaves as the most decorated player in the history of K-State women's basketball, but she's also proven she can run with the men.

Her fifth point tonight will break Mike Evans' 16-year-old record, making Ohlde the all-time scoring leader in K-State history.

Dutmer will be starting in her ninth consecutive game tonight and 16th of her career. This season, K-State is 8-0 in games Dutmer has started.

"She's a pretty special kid to be called upon like she has the past couple years," junior forward Kendra Wecker said. "She's the kind of a player that goes unnoticed by a lot of teams, yet she'll come out and hurt you."

Newsom has seen action in 15 games this season. Not as well known for her game as her character, Patterson said her team feeds off Newsom's presence in the lineup.

"It's absolutely inspiring to see someone with such a small window of opportunity on the

Women's golf claims 3rd place in tourney

By Matt Stuchlik
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They weren't in Kansas anymore, but the women's golf team brought the windy Kansas weather to Parrish, Fla.

The final round of the Central District Invitational was Tuesday.

Overall, the Wildcat golfers finished third, with a team score of 912, hitting a 313 in the final round.

The coaches and players said the harsh wind conditions contributed to the high scoring.

"There were some tough conditions today, but we hung in there and played hard," Coach Kristi Knight said.

River Wilderness Golf Course also brought challenging hole positions to the table and caused many players to post higher scores. The Wildcats overcame these obstacles and turned in the third-place finish.

Individually, senior Karen Quintelier led the Cats and posted a score of 227. She finished the tournament in a tie for 10th place.

Another strong performance was turned in by senior Christine Boucher, who shot a 228 to finish in a tie for 13th place.

Behind her was freshman Helene Robert, finishing in a tie for 21st place. She shot a final-round score of 78 to finish the tournament at 229.

"In any final round of a tournament, the player's nerves kick in. This is especially true if you are in contention for a high finish," Knight said.

This held true for junior Sarah Heffel, who, after a strong round Tuesday, struggled in shooting a final round score of 85. Heffel finished in a tie for 21st.

"We finished the tournament well as a team and took home third place. Hopefully, this start will give us the jumpstart we need," Knight said. "It would have been nice to make up a few more strokes and take first or second, but I am proud of all the girls," Knight said.

Louisiana State took home the first-place trophy with a team score of 903 and nipping closely at its heels was Michigan State, who shot a combined for a team score of 906.

The Wildcats will return home this week to fine tune their game. They will be back in action next week at the Texas A&M Mo'Morial Invitational starting March 1.

NFL | Broncos, Wilson reach agreement

Three-time Pro Bowl linebacker Al Wilson agreed Tuesday to a seven-year, $42 million contract with the Denver Broncos.

Wilson

The deal includes a signing bonus in excess of $10 million.

By agreeing to terms, Wilson avoided the Broncos' franchise designation, which would have paid him $5.834 million on a one-year contract, based on the averages of the top-10 salaries at his position last season.

The agreement could clear the way for the Broncos to continue negotiations with the Washington Redskins on a proposed trade of running back Clinton Portis to the Redskins for cornerback Champ Bailey. Because of salary cap concerns, Denver had hoped to finalize Wilson's contract before dealing with the Redskins.

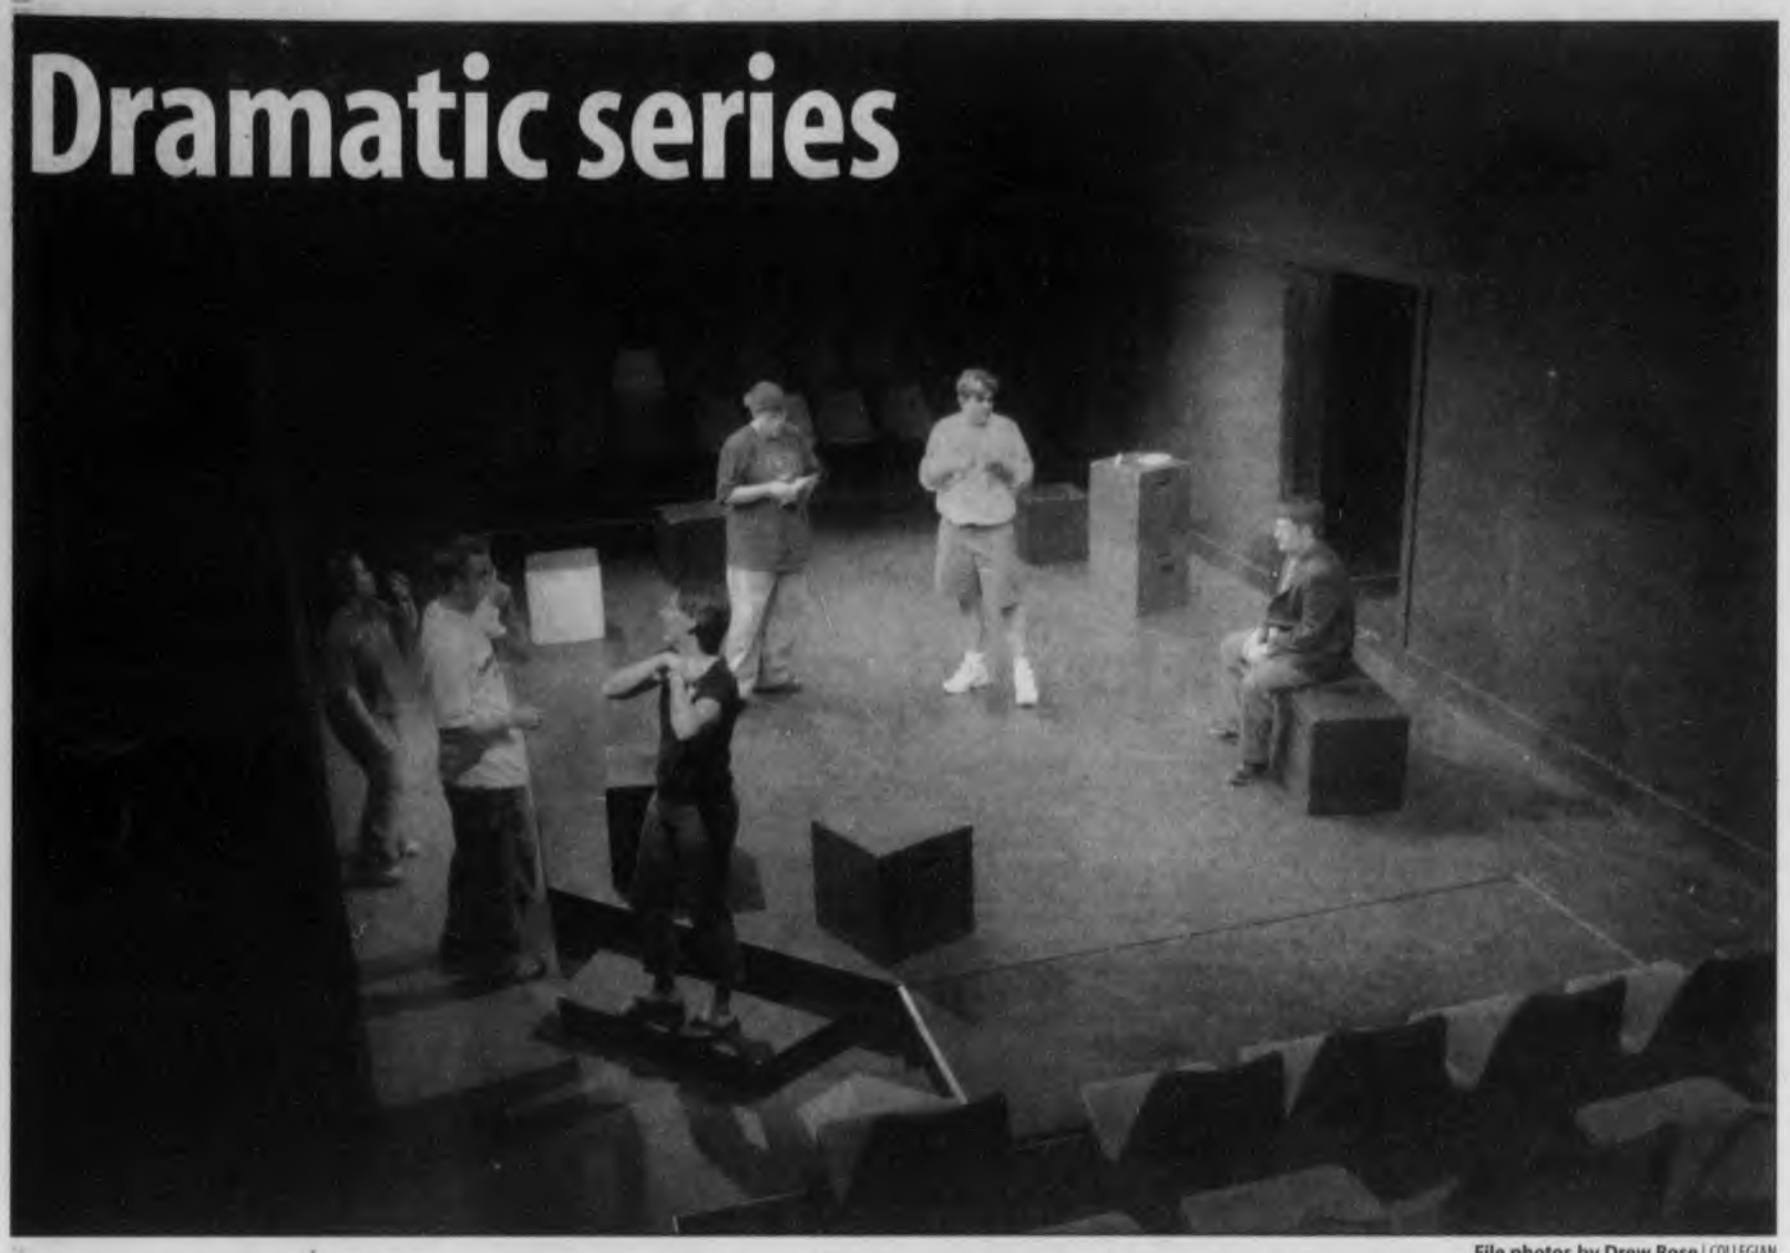
Quenneville

Quenneville, the winningest coach in franchise history and the NHL's coach of the year for the 1999-2000 season, was let go as the Blues scrambled to avoid missing the playoffs for the first time in 25 years.

The Blues are in ninth place in the Western Conference with a 29-23-7-2 record. Only the top eight teams make the playoffs.

Quenneville was the second NHL coach to be fired Tuesday. The Phoenix Coyotes fired Bob Francis earlier in the day and replaced him with assistant Rick Bowness.

Phoenix won just two of their past 14 games and, at 20-24-15-3, are in last place in the Pacific Division and 13th in the Western Conference.



Boxing | Louis sculpture vandalized

Pictures of two slain white police officers, signed "Courtesy of Fighting Whities," were found near the sculpture memorializing boxing great Joe Louis that was vandalized with white paint, a source close to the investigation said Tuesday.

The two suspects, one of them a township parks commissioner, were in custody in connection with the vandalism discovered early Monday at the landmark monument, a sculpture known as "the fist," police said.

The source, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the Associated Press that photocopies of pictures of two Detroit police officers killed on duty last week were found at the base of the sculpture.

Both slain officers were white. A black man was charged with the murders.

Students rehearse in the Purple Masque Theatre for an upcoming Lunchbag Theatre presentation. The event, featuring short plays directed by theater students, begins Thursday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Lunchbag Theatre features short, student-directed plays

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every spring for the past 27 years, audiences have been entertained for free, and students have been given the chance to act and direct due to Lunchbag Theatre.

The man behind Lunchbag is theater professor Lew Shelton, who started it.

"I had been teaching an acting/directing workshop, and we were working on a series of scenes, an ancient Greek scene, Shakespeare scene and then we did a one-act play," Shelton said. "I did that for a few years but felt the students weren't responding to it very well.

"So I came up with this idea, and I said, 'Each of you are going to direct two one-act plays,' and it's turned out to be a really good thing."

Lunchbag is the culmination of three classes: Practice in Directing, Practice in Acting, and Rehearsal Techniques. All the classes and performances take place in the East Stadium's Purple Masque Theatre.

The class typically has four or five directors and 10 to 15 actors. Each person is involved in two productions.

Shelton said the situation is similar to a theater company, where everyone is involved.

The idea is to work for three to four weeks rehearsing the play, which is a studio situation.

There are very few technical applications. Students use blocks, chairs and whatever they can find. Each director is paired with a student from the lighting design class to design for the one-act play.

The first play of the semester is "The Restaurant," directed by Ginny Pape, senior in theater.

The play is about a man named Norman, played by Michael Parker, senior in education; and a woman named Alice, played by Emily Wadsworth, junior in theater. They are an American couple visiting an unidentified foreign country. They eat at a small diner where they treat their waiter, (Joe Clark, senior in theater) badly. The waiter appears to speak very poor English.

This is Pape's second time taking the class. She took it last year as an actor, which caused some stress because, at the same time, she was in the opera "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

This is the first time Wadsworth has taken the class.

"It's a little more intense than fundamental or intermediate acting, because it's more structured and on a professional level, and we rehearse during class," she said.

Shelton said because of a tight budget, the plays cannot demand a lot of production costs, and as a result, they are more character-driven.

"We tend to get plays that tend to be more non-traditional than the plays we perform on Nichols or McCain," he said. "We get to do major playwrights we haven't been able to perform or without regularity. For example, in the first round, one student is directing a play by David Mamet."

That play is "Jolly," the second Lunchbag play, directed by Amanda Petrosky, graduate student in theater.

"Jolly" is story of a woman who resents her brother because he left when she was very young, but he returns during the play.

"There is great dialogue," Petrosky said. "They underline what they're saying and wish they could say more, but are too courteous to each other."

Mamet has written screenplays for such movies as "State and Main," "Spanish Prisoner" and "Heist." Petrosky said she was challenged by Mamet's writing style but said it will appeal to audiences.

"He gives everybody a chance to investigate what he was talking about," she said.

The play is about the death of theater and the blame that one critic takes for it. Shelton said an attribute of Lunchbag is the ability to produce the works of newer playwrights in addition to the classics.

An example of a "newer playwright" is Paula Vogel, who wrote the fourth play of the semester, "Desdemona."

"Desdemona" is the story of Shakespeare's "Othello" told from the point of view of the three women in the play: Othello's wife, Desdemona; Iago's wife, Amelia; and the prostitute Bianca.

The director of "Desdemona," Mike Eaton, graduate student in theater, said he chose this play because he is a fan of Vogel.

He said first discovered Vogel when the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance produced her 1998 Pulitzer Prize-winning "How I Learned to Drive," which Eaton described as the funny play about pedophilia.

"She's a real great feminist playwright," he said. "I hope the audience takes a funny new perspective on an old story."

Shelton said the class is set up so the plays are performed during class time. The plays start at noon, and people can bring their lunch with the cache of a lunch bag, or brown-bag special.

"This is good for students who don't get cast in main-stage productions, because it gives them a chance to test their acting wings," Shelton said. "It provides entertainment, cultural, opportunity."

Shelton said the goal of the class is to teach directors to communicate with actors and actors to communicate with directors.

"Somebody said theater is two actors, a plank and a curtain," Shelton said. "I want them to be well-rounded in those aspects before they go out and try to produce Jesus Christ Superstar, Les Miserables or something on roller skates."

This is Shelton's last Lunchbag season, as he is retiring after this semester. Students in the Lunchbag class said he will be missed.

"Lew means everything to the department," Eaton said.

Eaton said for the past 15 years, the department has had mock awards, and Shelton wins the best dressed award every time.

"He's like the suave older brother who knows how to do everything," Eaton said. "Students challenge him to push-up contests and he'll get down in his three-piece suit and beat them every time."

"The Passion of the Christ"

All times are for Wednesday only.

"The Passion of the Christ" (rated R for intense violence and gore): 1:30, 2, 4, 5, 7, 8 and 9:30 p.m.

This controversial film from actor/director Mel Gibson chronicles the final 12 hours of the life of Jesus Christ. The movie stars Jim Caviezel as Jesus.

CELEB NEWS

Gibson gets more screens

According to www.e-online .com, response to Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ" has been so great that Gibson is opening the film today in 2,800 theaters, instead of the 2,000 he originally planned.

Gibson

Thus far, according to box office trackers, the movie has garnered more than $10 million in advance-ticket sales, with churches buying entire auditoriums for private screenings. Trackers estimate the film to make $40 million during its first five days.

Actor Jim Caviezel plays Jesus Christ in the final hours of the figure's life; the movie has drawn anger from Jewish groups who interpret Gibson's film as blaming Jews for the crucifixion of Christ.

Rapper fakes casino out

The President Casino on the Admiral faces a possible $50,000 fine for not placing a cap on rapper Nelly and his group. The musician was visiting the Missouri casino for his birthday.

Nelly

Those in attendance at the party, which took place in November, didn't receive electronic ID cards limiting them to withdrawing $500 in gambling tokens every two hours. Instead, Nelly used the ID of an unknown woman in addition to receiving his own card.

Although the rapper isn't being held liable for the incident, the Missouri Gambling Commission said the casino itself is responsible for upholding its laws.

Manson cleared in court

Shock rocker Marilyn Manson reached a settlement last week in a case in which he rubbed his genitals in the face of a security officer at a July 2001 concert.

Manson

Manson, whose real name is Brian Warner, pleaded no contest to the charges of assault and battery for the incident, during which Manson was clad only in a thong and pantyhose.

A judge threw out a charge of sexual misconduct. The two parties agreed upon a settlement Jan. 28, but the terms of the settlement are confidential.

Manson faced similar charges in October 2000, when a Minnesota security officer sued Manson for his own genital-rubbing incident.

The officer sued Manson for $75,000, but a Minnesota jury cleared Manson of the charges last September.

Manson's last album, "Golden Age of the Grotesque," was released last year. The artist hasn't restricted himself to music alone: his 1998 autobiography, "Long, Hard Road Out of Hell," was on the New York Times Bestseller List, and he has appeared in films and documentaries, including "Bowling for Columbine" (2002) and "Party Monster" (2003).

Alleged bin Laden associates charged

By Robert Burns
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The Pentagon brought war crimes conspiracy charges Tuesday against two men alleged to be associates of terror leader Osama bin Laden, and said they will face the first U.S. military tribunals convened since World War II.

Government prosecutors ruled out seeking the death penalty against the two.

Ibrahim Ahmed Mahmoud al Qosi, of Sudan, was a paymaster for bin Laden's al-Qaeda network, and Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al Bahlul, of Yemen, was a propagandist for bin Laden, according to an official list of charges released by the Pentagon.

Neither is accused of assaulting Americans.

"These are not trigger men," said Eugene Fidell of the National Institute of Military Justice.

He is an attorney for James Yee, an Army chaplain accused of mishandling classified information from the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center where more than 600 terror suspects are held.

Trial dates have not been set for al Qosi or al Bahlul. The two could face maximum sentences of life in prison if convicted.

The government had said previously it would not seek the death penalty against David Hicks of Australia, one of six Guantanamo Bay detainees whom President Bush said last July are subject to trial by military tribunal. Of the six, only al Qosi and al Bahlul have been charged.

The Pentagon's decision not to seek the death penalty against al Qosi or al Bahlul "tells me that those making the decisions are alert to worldwide sensitivities," Fidell said.

Charging papers released Tuesday assert the two men were war crimes conspirators but provide no documentation to support the claim.

Air Force Maj. Michael Shavers, a Pentagon spokesman, said the charges are based on information obtained from intelligence and interrogations of the two suspects.

The specific acts forming the basis of the conspiracy charges against al Qosi and al Bahlul include:

- Participating in military training at al-Qaeda sponsored camps in Afghanistan. Al Qosi is alleged to have trained there from late 1990 to early 1991 and al Bahlul for two months in 1999.
- Performing duties in support of al-Qaeda. Al Qosi is alleged to have worked as an accountant for al-Qaeda in Peshawar, Pakistan, starting in September 1991 and in a similar role in his native Sudan from 1992 through 1995 for a company set up to help finance al-Qaeda activities.
- Promoting bin Laden and his cause of killing Americans. Al Bahlul is alleged to have created several instructional and motivational recruiting video tapes on behalf of al-Qaeda; he also is alleged to have created a video "glorifying, among other things, the attack on the USS Cole," the Navy destroyer severely damaged in October 2000 by explosives carried alongside the ship in a small boat.

Reputation important in search for mechanic

It happens every day — cars break down. For people with this problem, there are several ways to choose the right repair shop. According to the Federal Trade Commission, people looking for a mechanic should ask for recommendations from friends or people they trust and look for an auto repair shop before they actually need one to avoid being rushed when your car does break down.

The FTC also suggests asking to see current licenses and making sure the repair shop will honor your vehicle's warranty.

The following are some auto repair shop choices in Manhattan:

AUTOTECH
- Full Automotive Service Excellence certifications for automotive, some qualifications for diesel
- $130 for tune-up, which includes replacement of spark plugs and fuel filter, wire inspection, cleaning throttle body, PCV system and air filter inspection
- $130-$150 per axle for brake service, includes new pads or shoes, resurfacing the rotors, bleeding the system
- No alignments

BURNETT AUTOMOTIVE
- Full ASE certifications
- $120 for tune up, which includes spark plugs, fuel filter, vehicle inspections; other pricing done on a case-by-case basis
- $129.95 for standard brake service, which includes turning rotors and replacing pads
- $59 for four-wheel alignment

DAVIS TIRE & AUTOMOTIVE
- Full ASE certifications
- $50-$100 for tune up depending on model, make and engine size
- $100 per axle for brake service, which includes pads, resurfacing rotors, labor
- No alignments

EXPERT TIRE
- Full ASE certifications
- $34.99 and up for tune-up based on what service the car is scheduled for
- $99.99 and up for brake service, which includes resurfacing rotors and replacing pads
- $59.99 for alignment service

Briggs Auto Group
- Full ASE certifications, GM certified
- $39.95 for fuel filter, $23.95 for an oil change and vehicle inspection

COLORADO | K-State reviews policies after Colorado allegations

career in collegiate sports."

K-State's athletic administration has taken note of the problems of their counterparts to the west.

"We've talked to our head coaches about reviewing everything from paid visits to the recruiting process," Director of Athletics Tim Weiser said. "We met with our coaches last Thursday, and we'll meet again in a few weeks."

Hnida

As K-State reviews its own athletic program, steps are being made at the conference level to prevent and deal with situations like the one at Colorado.

Weiser and Weiberg said athletic directors from every Big 12 school will meet in early May for an open dialogue on recent controversies within the conference.

"We decided we as a conference need to come together to see what we can do as a whole and on our campuses," Weiser said.

The recent Colorado ordeal is just the latest incident of bad publicity for the conference.

Iowa State, Missouri and Baylor all have seen scandals in the past year.

Iowa State basketball coach Larry Eustachy lost his job for drinking and partying with students. The Baylor basketball program under former coach Dave Bliss violated several NCAA rules in the wake of Bears basketball player Patrick Dennehy's murder. And an NCAA investigation is ongoing into possible rule violations by the Missouri basketball program.

"I'm disappointed more than frustrated," Weiberg said. "As we build our conference we want to do it with integrity."

Weiberg hopes that schools are reacting to unethical or illegal actions in the right way.

"When schools have findings of wrongdoing, I hope it's dealt with aggressively and promptly, and people aren't being coddled," he said.

The NCAA has wasted no time in making its feelings known about the Colorado scandal and concerning another recent situation regarding a top University of Miami recruit who had 10 arrests on his record that school officials said they did not know about until after he signed his letter of intent.

NCAA President Myles Brand has announced the creation of a task force to examine possible recruiting rule changes and how to help prevent recruiting scandals.

On Monday, nine of the task force's proposed 16 members were appointed.

"This task force has a big job in a short period of time," Brand said in a statement. "We are not going to go through another recruiting calendar in football without new standards in place."

Weiser did not disagree with the creation of the task force but said he doubts it can change the recruiting process in the short-term.

"In recruiting, the system has been in place for so many years that to overhaul it in a short period of time could be impossible," he said. "I can't imagine any significant changes for at least a year."

One possible change that could be made regarding the NCAA recruiting process in all sports is the addition of a rule specifically stating sex cannot be used as a recruiting tool.

Weiser said he was dismayed that such a rule would need to be created.

"Circumstances have forced us to think in ways we haven't thought," he said. "Some of this stuff is basic common sense."

However, Weiser said new rules can only do so much.

"It might be the appropriate step to take, but you can't legislate morality, you can't legislate integrity," he said.

Some say one explanation for recent scandals has been the increased emphasis of athletics over academics at universities, creating an environment where athletes feel invincible and free to do what they please.

David Zalubowski | THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Betsy Hoffman, front, president of the University of Colorado, speaks during a news conference that announced the school's football coach, Gary Barnett, has been put on administrative leave Feb. 18 in Denver. Chancellor Richard Byyny, back, listens. Barnett was put on leave because of comments he made after a former player said she was raped by a teammate four years ago.

Colorado physics professor and 2001 Nobel Prize-winner Carl Wieman said his university had become "an academic appendage to the football program."

At K-State, one professor does not see that as the case.

"I've always thought President Wefald has struck a good balance between academics and athletics, and that they can coincide," Ryan Spohn, assistant professor of criminology, said.

As for the Colorado ordeal, some might wonder what is being done to prevent or control negative conduct by athletes at K-State.

Long before recent scandals erupted, Shoop, professor of educational law, has been involved in educating athletes and athletic staff at K-State on handling the high-profile environment in which they live.

"For the past five years, every incoming athlete spends two hours with me discussing legal and ethical implications of illegal sexual behavior," he said.

"I talk about the issue of respect and how behaviors can be misconstrued, legal aspects and alcohol use and how it plays into many of these situations."

Shoop – who meets with each Wildcat athlete once a year – said K-State was "ahead of the curve" in educating its athletes on poor behavior.

Despite preventive actions, K-State has not escaped negative incidents.

Allegations of rape against quarterback Ell Roberson at this year's Fiesta Bowl never resulted in criminal charges, but brought K-State into the fray of controversy.

Spohn, who also did his undergraduate work at K-State, said the Roberson scandal unfortunately has grouped K-State's name with other troubled conference schools.

"People who don't know much about K-State only know one of these recent scandals happened here," Spohn said.

Weiser said total prevention of wrongdoing is impossible, whether it concerns athletes or coaches.

"Young people make mistakes. Adults make mistakes," he said. "The response to occurrences is what matters. It's what we do about finding out and fixing the problem."

But ultimately for Weiser, many of the problems in the NCAA exist for one reason.

"In the end, it comes down to the same issue it always has – money," he said. "And the pressure on coaches, administrators and athletic directors to produce winners that translate into dollars. If someone can cut a corner to get to the promised land they'll do it.

"If you have people that aren't of significant quality of character, that'll show up."

SENIORS | Women end KSU careers

floor to be so intensely invested in our program," she said. "It's the epitome of selflessness, enthusiasm and leadership. You don't see someone as emotion-driven and respected as a leader as Kimmery is."

The difference between the K-State team she joined her freshman year and the one she leaves this year is comparable to the difference between "night and day," Dutmer said.

"We're all really close and we've all experienced what it could be like when things aren't going well," she said. "Making it to the Sweet Sixteen was two years being night and day. We knew what it was like to be on the other end of everything. These two years being so different have been just incredible."

For Newsom, the journey from Tennessee has been a long one, but she said she could not see it happening any other way.

"It means a lot. It's extremely important," she said. "You come in as a freshman, and you think you'll never get to your senior year, but it's here, and it's been a journey. There have been a lot– a lot– of great memories that I'll take from this program. It's been a tremendous opportunity."

While she had no idea what kind of opportunities these three would have upon joining the program in 2000, Patterson said she is glad to see them leaving on such a high note.

"It's going to be heart-wrenching to think about the fact that they are leaving us," Patterson said. "But it's also exciting that they are going to be leaving on the wave of such an incredible Big 12 season so far."

GAY MARRIAGE | Bush supports constitutional amendment

insufficient alternative to marriage. "The amendment should fully protect marriage while leaving the state legislatures free to make their own choices in defining legal arrangements other than marriage," said Bush, who opposed legalizing civil unions when he was governor of Texas, according to the Associated Press.

The amendment comes in the wake of recent victories for the lesbian, gay, transsexual and bisexual movement.

In 2003, the Supreme Court ruled in Bowers vs. Hardwick laws declaring homosexual sodomy illegal, but excluding couples partaking in heterosexual sodomy.

In addition, the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled laws prohibiting gay marriage to be unconstitutional.

Over the past 12 days, democratic San Francisco mayor Gavin Newsom has permitted thousands of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transsexual couples to be married in defiance of California law.

Newsom has received scorn from republicans such as California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger and President Bush for his direct violations of the law.

Amending the Constitution is not quick or simple process, however.

A two-thirds majority of both the House and Senate must pass an amendment.

Then it is sent to the states for ratification.

It must be approved by three-fourths, or 38 of the 50 states, to become a law.

Passionate faith

Photos by Chris Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Moviegoers attend the opening night of "The Passion of the Christ" on Wednesday night at Seth Childs Cinema. "The Passion" drew sell-out crowds for both evening showings. The controversial film earned more attention Wednesday when a woman died in Wichita after collapsing during the graphic crucifixion scene.

"The strong violence is a tremendous, necessary reminder of just how much Christ suffered for our sins."

'The Passion of the Christ' opens; moviegoers have mixed reviews

Mel Gibson's controversial film, "The Passion of the Christ," opened Wednesday with mixed reviews.

Much of the controversy resulted from Gibson's choice of raw violence portraying the last 12 hours of Jesus Christ's life.

However, Father Keith Weber of St. Isidore Catholic Student Center said he sees it differently.

"The strong violence is a tremendous, necessary reminder of just how much Christ suffered for our sins," he said.

Some who saw the opening of "The Passion of the Christ" said they agreed.

"I expected the violence. You simply can't get the point across without it," Tracy Briscoe, junior in life science, said.

Candidates debate election issues

By Scott A. Seel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Election season at K-State kicked into high gear Wednesday with the first presidential debate, in the Union Courtyard.

Candidates discussed issues such as Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' budget proposal, rising tuition costs and technology advances.

Candidates Ben Procter, junior in political science; Leah Pence, junior in agricultural communications and women's studies; Bryce Huschka, sophomore in industrial engineering; Vicki Conner, senior in biology and political science; Hayley Urkevich, senior in finance; and Daniel Hill, junior in political science, took part in the debate.

BUDGET AND TUITION

Procter said he voted with the Student Senate in expressing concern on the budget.

In addition to this, Procter said he followed that vote in Topeka by discussing the issue with various legislators.

Procter said he and his running mate, Andrew Treaster, junior in political science, have experience working with state government to voice the concerns of the students.

Procter said he served on the advisory board to the Kansas Board of Regents and wanted to work to keep tuition low to prevent students from leaving K-State because of tuition.

Huschka said the governor's proposal–taking money from the restricted budget–was a travesty and "almost like double-taxing" students.

Huschka and his running mate, Justin Shrauner, sophomore in industrial engineering, plan to decrease tuition for out-of-state students, who pay significantly higher tuition than in-state students, in order to increase out-of-state enrollment. They believe this will increase revenue for the university.

Huschka said it was important for students to realize the Student Governing Association and the student body president had no control over tuition, rather they could only voice concerns to those in control.

World leaders discuss security force in Haiti

Bush says 'effective strategy' in place to deal with Haitian refugees in U.S.

By George Gedda
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – President Bush said Wednesday the United States supports the creation of an international security presence in Haiti to maintain order if a political settlement is reached.

Bush

France's foreign minister, Dominique de Villepin, went a step further, saying such a force should be established immediately so it can get to work quickly once a government of national unity is formed.

Bush said the United States remains hopeful a political settlement can be worked out between the Haitian government and opposition parties.

Diplomatic efforts to obtain a settlement were set back after opposition leaders rejected a plan backed by the United States, other hemispheric countries and the European Union. A key element of the plan is the appointment of an independent prime minister who has broad-based support.

Bush said the United States has an "effective strategy" in place to deal with any exodus of Haitians toward the United States.

"We will turn back any refugee that attempts to reach our shore, and that message needs to be very clear as well to the Haitian people," Bush said.

Haitians fled a political crisis in large numbers 12 years ago. There has been little evidence of a repeat of that situation thus far, although a freighter with 22 Haitians on board was intercepted by the Coast Guard off the coast of Miami Beach.

Meanwhile, a delegation of about 18 members of the Congressional Black Caucus met with Bush and other top officials on the Haitian situation Wednesday.

Caucus Chairman Elijah Cummings, D-Md., said the group urged Bush to consider the establishment of a "humanitarian quarter" in Haiti where relief supplies could be distributed.

Kansas woman dies after viewing 'Passion'

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA – A woman collapsed Wednesday during a screening of "The Passion of the Christ" and later died at a hospital.

The Wichita Eagle identified the woman as Peggy Law Scott, 57. No cause of death was immediately available.

Scott was at a 9:30 a.m. showing of the movie with co-workers from Clear Channel Radio when she collapsed about 20 minutes before the end of the movie.

KAKE-TV, which was filming a story on local responses to the film, reported that Scott collapsed during the film's bloody crucifixion scene.

Two medical professionals, including Dr. Ron Morford, were at the movie and tried to revive Scott, said Ken Crockett, a spokesman for Warren Theatres.

Morford said Scott was sitting behind him. The movie was hitting a climactic point, he said, when he heard people saying something was wrong.

Morford said got out of his seat to see people get Scott into the aisle.

"I was checking her, and it didn't seem like she was breathing," Morford said.

He said she didn't have a pulse.

Someone called 911. Two women, at least one of them a nurse, began to perform CPR.

While people were helping Scott, the lights were turned on and moviegoers were ushered out.

Scott was taken to the St. Joseph campus of Via Christi Regional Medical Center. Roz Hutchinson, a spokeswoman for the hospital, confirmed the death.

An autopsy will be conducted on Thursday, according to a spokeswoman for Sedgwick County.

Scott was the general sales manager for KRZZ and KKRD radio stations.

PILOTS program helps freshmen adapt to college life

By Lara Hastings
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Going from classrooms of 20 students in high school to giant lecture halls of more than 100 students in college can be overwhelming for incoming freshmen, and may cause a blow to their first semester grade point averages.

The K-State PILOTS program was designed to relieve some of the pressure and stress incoming freshmen experience.

Anita Cortez, director of the program, said the purpose of the program is to make sure freshmen become sophomores.

Instead of taking the normal large section classes, students in the PILOTS program have access to smaller lectures and smaller sections of core classes such as expository writing and public speaking.

The students in the program also have access to private computer labs and focused study sessions.

The program works closely with the colleges of Arts and Sciences, Business, Human Ecology and Education.

Students join the program during freshman enrollment in June under the program's specific reference numbers.

Usually, students are referred to the program by their academic advisers, but now that the program has been around for 10 years, Cortez said many students are referred by other families or older siblings who have gone through the program.

The year-long PILOTS program has spots for 150 students, and Cortez said the program always fills to capacity each fall.

There is a broad range of skill level among the students, but the program has been successful, Cortez said. Cortez said about 15 percent of the students in the program receive academic honors.

Other activities of the program include a talent show, which began last year and continued for its second year Tuesday night in the K-State Student Union.

Rebeca Paz, adviser for the PILOTS program, said the talent show allows students in the program to get involved in activities outside of school.

"We want our students to be able to show off their talents, because our students are very talented," she said.

Tuesday night's show included a variety of student performances including singing, dancing, poetry reading and a fashion show.

The audience, consisting of other students in the PILOTS program and the general public, used tally cards to vote for the first-, second- and third-place winners.

Joshua Criswell, freshman in kinesiology with a minor in leadership studies, won the $50 first prize for his reading of "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" by Langston Hughes.

Criswell said with the one-on-one attention he felt like the PILOTS program has given him an advantage.

"It just makes the acclimation to college life a little easier," he said.

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN
Anita Cortez, director of the PILOTS Program, watches the group's talent show Tuesday night at Union Station. The PILOTS group is made of freshmen and encourages positive academic growth. Of the group's 150 members, 85 percent received a 3.0 GPA or higher during the fall semester.

New debate arises over morning-after pill

FDA moves to make pill more available

By Bailey Basinger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The morning-after pill has once again raised controversy across the nation.

The Food and Drug Administration is condoning making the emergency contraceptive available without a prescription.

The morning-after pill, also known as Plan B, is an extremely strong dose of the hormone Progestin found in regular birth control. It is designed to change the lining of the uterine wall, so the egg cannot attach itself and cause pregnancy.

According to the Sexual Health Web site, www.sexualhealth.org, taking the emergency contraceptive has an 89 percent success rate, and the earlier the pill is taken the more effective it is.

There is a 120-hour window in which a patient can still seek help. The most common side effect are nausea and vomiting.

Crystal Lander of the Feminist Majority Foundation said she wants to increase education on the drug. FMF campaigns on college campuses and promotes education about Plan B across the nation.

"People need to remember this is a plan B – it's there in case a condom breaks or a woman forgets to take her birth control. It is a back-up," said Lander. "The truth is, we don't take erasers off pencils because people make mistakes, and it's the same with Plan B."

Students who are interested in making Plan B over-the-counter are encouraged by FMF to start petitions and send them to the FDA.

"We have turned in over 90,000 signatures gathered by students and health care providers on campus," Lander said.

In Manhattan, like the rest of the nation, the pill is not available over-the-counter.

However, some local health care providers think it may be beneficial.

Kathy Dickey, clinic supervisor at the Riley County Health Department, said having the emergency contraceptive available over-the-counter would be a good resource for women.

"Some women are too ashamed, embarrassed or frightened to see a doctor," Dickey said. "Some would buy it over-the-counter to remain anonymous."

Lander said she agrees privacy is the main reason to get the pill over-the-counter. But she said young girls should never feel like there is no option for them.

"I don't want young people to feel like they are by themselves," Lander said. "When that happens, people go to extremes, and we find babies in plastic bags outside of proms. It could also help reduce the number of abortions."

Dickey said she does not think having the pill available without a prescription will make the general population stop practicing its regular methods of birth control.

She said there would be few people who take other precautionary measures less seriously.

Jennifer Wiesner, a sophomore in business and member of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators, said she hopes people do not disregard preventative means of contraceptives.

"I hope it is only used in cases of emergencies," Wiesner said.

The health department has the pill available at the walk-in clinic to patients for $42. Dickey said patients can get a prescription and then receive the pill in about 20 or 30 minutes.

Lafene Health Center also offers the pill to students. According to a Lafene official, the process is fairly quick and simple. It costs $20.

Collegian not racist in recent coverage oversight

TO THE POINT

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian failed to give appropriate coverage to a story last week, but racism was not the cause of this failure.

K-State student groups organized the Big 12 Conference on Black Student Government last weekend, which attracted students from all over the nation. The conference focused on the struggles and challenges of the past and the rewards of being black. Several campus organizations planned this event for the last two years.

We received angry feedback in Fourum comments, letters to the editor and personal communication. Many of these remarks accuse the Collegian staff of racism.

This is not the case.

The Collegian made a mistake. A big one. It was an oversight on our part in not realizing the magnitude of the event.

After receiving a press release, we chose to write a preview story to inform readers in case they wanted to attend. While the Collegian does not have space to cover all campus events, we strive to provide readers with information on the most prominent activities.

Our method of news gathering is to let organizations come to us and inform of us upcoming events. After this incident we have changed policies. We now have assigned a reporter to seek out news from multi-cultural organizations.

Our hope is that organizations continue to come to us, and our new policy will help to find more news.

While the recent oversight was unfortunate, we are human, and we make mistakes. But the only thing we can do is correct the problem.

Myth busters

Politically motivated group gives its version of truth

GRANT REICHERT

Welcome to the first annual edition of MemeBusters™.

At MB, we mercifully euthanize lingering memes of yesteryear with shotgun blasts of reason, give inflammatory rhetoric cortisonal shots of clarity and de-fund bankrupt ideas once and for all.

Exposing ignorant lies for what they are (i.e. ignorant lies) is not hard, and that's why MB does it.

But not only do we have the audacity to call the emperor naked, we have the valor to make snide comments about his anatomy while doing it. We're heroes, really.

The MB think tank will now turn its turret toward the first enememe and open fire.

Illustrations by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

BUSH WAS AWOL: ABSENCE OF EVIDENCE IS EVIDENCE OF ABSENCE

We here at MB have got to admit that the Democrats have skillfully latched onto nothing here.

Meme is as follows: the absence of 30-year-old records proves irrefutably that Bush went AWOL on a cocaine-induced bender to eat babies and torture kittens.

Democrats, in their torrid love affair with Bush hatred, seem to have entirely divorced from logic here, ending a marriage that never was very secure.

The inability of meme-iacs to actually prove anything substantive has led them to claim preposterously that Bush must disprove the AWOL charge.

Bush has tried to placate these jackasses by providing at least two witnesses that corroborate his service, as well as records that show he was paid for the time in question.

To which AWOL-chargers reply, with the smug attitude of someone who just received attention for throwing a tantrum, "The records were doctored, and the witnesses are cyborgs."

As this meme is not likely to die, MB proposes a countermeme to restore cosmic balance to the political universe.

Anyone who charges Bush was AWOL must prove, with multiple documents, hundreds of witnesses and holographic video, that they did not murder Laci Peterson.

WAR FOR OIL: GULF WAR I SYNDROME

This meme, spread mainly by Islamic fundamentalist-sponsored anti-war rallies, has pulled a Lazarus from the first war in Iraq.

It owes its success both to the inherent simplicity of these three words as well as the simplicity of those spittle-faced protestors who spew it. But, admittedly, the MB staff tried saying "war for oil" three times fast and gained a new respect for placard waving buffoons everywhere.

This meme falters, though, because any attempt to reduce such a complex issue as the reason for the war in Iraq down to a simple "for oil" reeks of ignorance, a smell with which MB is intimately familiar.

If the United States were worried only about oil, then we would have dropped the sanctions on Iraq and propped up Saddam as our oleaginous ally. WFO advocates chant their mantra in part because Bush and Cheney have connections in the oil industry.

It doesn't matter that Slate magazine ran an article proving the correlation coefficient between campaign contributions and contracts in Iraq is statistically insignificant.

Even prestigious MB scholars admit that close connections to a big business suggest something.

MB must confess, if it were John F. Heinz-Kerry going to war, we would be the first to hit the streets with newly printed "War for Ketchup" signs.

IMMINENT THREAT: IN A MINUTE IMMINENT LIE ATTAINS EMINENCE

If MB had a nickel every time this whopper was repeated, we could get rid of the asbestos in the cafeteria ceiling and switch our etch-a-sketches to computers.

This tricky little bit of meme-ery asserts that Bush claimed Iraq was an "imminent threat" to America.

MB can vaguely recall Bush using the words "grave," "serious" and "terrible" to describe the threat, but never "imminent." One MB staffer even swears she heard Bush say, in his January 2003 State of the Union address, that he would not wait until a threat became imminent to act.

So, the imminent threat meme turns out to be no more than a bald-faced lie. The left seems to have decided to store its integrity and intellectual honesty in the same thimble.

At least one MB staffer wonders what they're going to do with all the room left in there.

FUNERALS AND FUNDING: PUTTING THE 'FUN' FUNERAL AND THE 'UNABASHED LIE' IN FUNDING

We're almost out of time here, so let's see if we can't practice some speed eugenics and quickly sterilize a couple of ideas that shouldn't be reproducing.

First meme: President Bush hasn't been attending military funerals.

According to MB historical research, presidents rarely attend anything other than collective services.

And if Bush did attend them, you can be sure the left would be shrieking "Photo op!" just as they do whenever Bush visits the troops.

Last meme: Bush has cut funding for veterans.

Hmm ... according to the nonpartisan www.factcheck.org, funding is up 27 percent. MB prediction: vets in 'vettes.

This has been a uni-partisan, for-profit message brought to you by the MB Institute of Armchair Punditry. All rights reserved, and all wrongs righted.

Candidates hide behind slogans, empty promises

CHRISTOPHER HARROP

It's that time of year again.

It's time for low-quality T-shirt and button manufacturers to reap extra profits, while students start emptying their pockets at the sight of one of the soon to be inundating student body president campaign signs.

Student Governing Association elections begin with such great aspirations on the parts of both the campaigns and the supporters yet always devolve into a comedy of errors.

First come the filings – most years yield half a dozen candidate pairs for student body president and vice president. This year is no exception.

It appears the Greek community was unable to decide on two candidate pairs to back. If they had, I'm sure at least half of the current candidates would have been bribed out of running with SUVs.

Next come the alliterated catchphrases, like "Pitiful Policies ... Pretty People."

These slogans let you, the voter, know immediately that you are dealing with a candidate who either can't come up with something better or actually thinks a slogan is a valid substitute for a platform.

They are dangerous, outside-the-box thinkers who often employ acronyms instead of alliteration. These people obviously are out of the loop and will be pummeled by the masses during the primary election for their insubordination.

Some candidates may set up Web sites. This is a campaign tool that not only allows visitors to mock poor HTML and design skills, but it also provides candidates the opportunity to illegally use Collegian photos for their campaign. Huzzah!

Most years, you can follow the campaign through the primary election and not hear about a single platform issue. While this year we're being treated to a number of platforms, most platform issues still are vague or just downright stupid.

Voters should be on the lookout for candidates that use the words "community," "commitment" or "dedication" as platform points. These are empty words in this context, conveying little real meaning. If these words were taken literally as qualifications for office, I know a few hundred viable candidates in the residence halls alone.

More specific platforms actually will talk about real issues – recycling, diversity programming, finding new ways to boost revenues and expanding student services, such as Lafene Health Center and Hale Library.

Other candidates will throw money at SafeRide to ensure his or her buddies can enjoy a night of heavy drinking without the worry of responsibility.

Others will simply target faculty advising and course wait lists – problems that don't really exist.

My favorite candidates are the ones who make me laugh.

These candidates will tout reforms they have absolutely no control over.

For example, limiting tuition increases. In the past two years of tuition increases, I'm certain the student body would have elected someone to stop the increases if they could. Why didn't they? Because that's something we as a student body cannot control.

Another example of candidates campaigning beyond their means is the student portal system currently in development by the Information Technology Assistance Center.

The portal project is already underway, and a committee has been formed to get input as to what students want the portal to contain.

This fact, however, has not stopped candidates from making it their own pet project without even mentioning iTAC.

We should at least thank our lucky stars no one has brought up the insolvable parking issue – the Pandora's Box of campus politics.

Despite all these misgivings about the upcoming elections, it is possible for one of the candidates to emerge as a real force for change. It's happened before, and it can happen again.

Until then, make sure you wear your campaign materials proudly – unless you're an employee of the university – and try not to break any elections guidelines.

An abortion isn't just a medical procedure, Mickayla Fink. Technically, a miscarriage is a natural abortion.

I think they should put the cut-off shirt store next to the hat store. That way, the frat guys won't have to go too far to get their cut-offs and franchises.

Abortion hurts women just as much as the unborn, causing physical and psychological damage.

Morning-after pill requires professional advice

Editor,

Mickayla Fink's column about the morning-after pill is deeply disturbing.

Unfortunately, Mickayla just told a large number of young females the morning-after pill doesn't cause abortions. When dealing with this controversial an issue, one must be very careful to define one's terms. Mickayla is correct that emergency contraception prevents implantation.

What she didn't say was EC prevents implantation of a fertilized egg. Some say once the egg is fertilized, a woman is pregnant, regardless of implantation. Thus, any method that prevents implantation of a fertilized egg is an abortion agent.

Mickayla throws around the thought that EC should be available to any woman, whenever, wherever, essentially uncontrolled.

The reason regular birth-control pills are still by prescription only is that they can have serious consequences if misused, and should not be used by every woman. Should you pop MS Contin (morphine) just because you have a headache and can't get to a doctor quickly?

We go to doctors to make sure we stay healthy and often, to make sure a drug won't hurt us. By stating EC should be available over the counter, Mickayla is suggesting that it be as readily available as Tylenol. Even Tylenol is a drug, one can harm us if taken irresponsibly.

Even taking EC when it's prescribed can cause severe nausea and bleeding. Do you want to risk that without getting a professional opinion first?

I would think about possible consequences before I shoot my mouth off about drugs.

Diversity issues go ignored

Editor,

While I have heard numerous positive comments regarding the article done on my leadership efforts in Monday's Collegian, I personally have not read it, nor do I have plans to do so.

My protest stems from a lack of coverage in the Collegian on the Big 12 Conference on Black Student Government that was hosted by K-State from Thursday through Sunday.

I find it appalling that more than 1,000 students of color – black, Latino, white, Asian – and their advisers could come to our campus, generate thousands of dollars in the Manhattan, Wamego, Junction City, K-State and surrounding communities and not receive any mention in the Collegian. A travesty that the caliber of the speakers such as Dick Gregory, Susan Taylor, Preacher Moss, Jonathan Sprinkles and Elaine Brown could not even garner a photo and a cutline.

What the staff of the Collegian and the K-State community not in attendance at the conference missed were pertinent discussions on race issues and problems that many of the attendees experience on a regular basis on their own campuses.

But you also would have seen a comedian who used comedy to make you think about the stupidity of race. You would have heard an inspirational message to a young black man. You would have witnessed a deeply emotional speech by President Jon Wefald on black history.

I gladly would have traded the space my article occupied in your paper for coverage of this student-run conference that has been more than two years in the making. The efforts of the students who contributed to its success were much more deserving.

The reporter who interviewed me asked me a question about the most difficult thing I have had to overcome because of my race. Although I turned the response around somewhat, perhaps I should have told her trying to get fair and balanced coverage of students of color in the Collegian.

Ironically, the student newspapers at both Iowa State and Kansas had more coverage of a conference on our campus. The Daily Kansan even sent a reporter to cover the conference. But what I find even more appalling than the lack of coverage in our campus newspaper is the subtle, juvenile, racially tainted comments that permeate the campus Fourum.

I am hard-pressed to believe the news of any fights or anything negative that might have occurred at the conference would not have been plastered on the front page had they taken place.

I realize the Collegian is a laboratory setting that prepares future journalists to venture into the real world of the profession.

To think that your staff of reporters is the future of this industry is a scary thought.

Students who want to learn will go to class

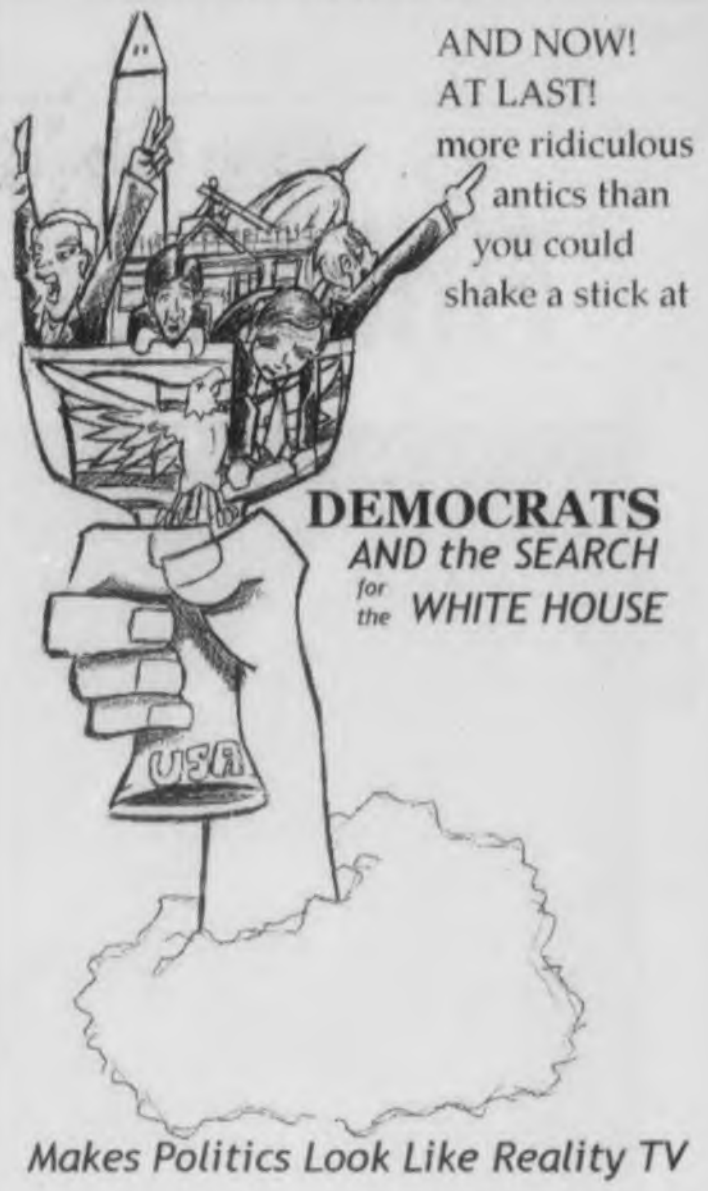
Editor,

I am writing in regard to your editorial about the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee's proposal to change the time period in which faculty members may drop a student due to non-attendance from one week to one day.

I must disagree with your assessment that the proposal would be more problematic than the current situation. As a graduate student, I have run the gamut from being the lowly freshman who was stuck in limbo waiting for classes to becoming first to enroll.

Although you pointed out "students often miss their first class because they are returning to school from a prior engagement, such as an internship or a study-abroad trip," if students hold themselves as accountable as they do their teachers, they should be able to notify the professor or the department if they know there will be a scheduling conflict.

And as I'm sure you know, when the absentee students don't come to their first classes, it is not due to internships and study-abroad trips, but the simple combination of being too lazy, coupled with the fact that professors only hand out syllabi on the first day.



As for "the proposal ... caus(ing) more work for faculty members as well," it would actually help add stability to their planned teaching strategy by knowing exactly how many will be in the class and if their classroom size is adequate. Also, not all classes meet two or three times a week. Many undergraduate and graduate courses meet only once a week. Therefore, the one class period non-attendance policy has already been essentially implemented for them, in a way.

This has not been bad by any means. Students who want to learn show up on the first day.

Teachers get to know their pupils, hand out the coursework only once and no one is left in limbo for a week or more, praying that someone will drop the class.

Women extend home winning streak

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Wednesday night, the women's basketball team honored its 2004 seniors, Kimmery Newsom, Amy Dutmer and Nicole Ohlde, in its second-to-last game of the season against Iowa State.

With K-State's showdown for the Big 12 title against Texas four days away, Iowa State came to Bramlage Coliseum hoping for a surprise upset.

Final result: No. 9 K-State 68, Iowa State 33.

The win was the ninth in a row for the Wildcats, and improves their record to 22-3 and 13-1 in Big 12 play, while Iowa State fell to 13-12 and 6-8.

K-State has won 11 straight home games, as well as 31 consecutive regular season games in Bramlage.

Ohlde followed with 12, and Dutmer and junior guard Laurie Koehn each chipped in 10.

Coach Deb Patterson said the game was a solid win for her team.

"Tonight was an all-around good night for our basketball team," Patterson said.

"I thought we left the floor feeling good about the quality of basketball that we played."

With emotions running high, the Wildcats dominated Iowa State from the beginning.

K-State jumped out of the gates with a 25-6 run, in which Ohlde became the school's all-time leading scorer by knocking down a pair of free-throws with 12:47 left in the first half.

Defense stifles Cyclones in convincing win

Women hold Iowa State to 25 percent shooting

By Nabil Shaheen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It took the No. 9 women's basketball team 12 seconds to knock down the first field goal of the game.

It took Iowa State four minutes and 42 seconds.

Its first two possessions resulted in consecutive, careless turnovers forced by the stingy Wildcat defense.

Cyclone coach Bill Fennelly said the 68-33 rout by the Wildcats was more about K-State's defense than its offense.

"We went backwards a little bit. They get a lot of credit for how good they are on offense, but they're a very good, very well-coached defensive team," Fennelly said.

Connecting on a mere 15 of its 59 shot attempts, Iowa State's offense shot 25.4 percent, including 5 percent from 3-point range, where the Cyclones average 35 percent.

"When you can't find the basket, that's tough," Iowa State forward Lisa Kriener said. "It was pretty much tough, in-your-face defense the whole game."

Junior forward Kendra Wecker said on the defensive end the Wildcats have gone from improving individually to maturing as a unit.

"We have grown up," Wecker said. "Any defense, whether man or zone, we're moving with every pass and communicating a lot more. We did a lot of switching tonight when we needed to."

K-State is the third best scoring defense in the Big 12, allowing only 57.4 points per game. In the field-goal percent defense category, the Cats are No. 1, allowing 35.2 percent shooting on average.

On the glass, the fourth-best rebounding team in the conference pulled down 37 with Wecker grabbing 11 of them.

"Kendra was a phenomenal presence on the boards, particularly in the second half," Coach Deb Patterson said.

Starting that second half on a 25-4 run, K-State continued to increase its offensive game and kept Iowa State in check, allowing just 15.2 percent shooting as the Cyclones scored 11 points the entire period.

Patterson said coaches and players both wanted to be relentless and maintain the high level of intensity on both ends of the floor.

The team's constant pursuit, particularly on the defensive end, resulted in 15 fast break points for K-State and 18 points off turnovers.

K-State 69, Iowa State 75

Iowa State proved why Hilton Coliseum has been less than forgiving to opponents this season by downing the K-State men, 75-69 Wednesday in Ames, Iowa.

After leading by four at the end of the first half, 32-28, the Wildcats (12-12, 4-9) couldn't find an answer to the red-hot, second-half shooting of the Cyclones (15-9, 6-7).

Senior guard Jake Sullivan, the Cyclones' sharp-shooter, exploded in the second half, scoring 19 of his game-high 24 points in the second half. Sullivan shot 7-of-11 from the field and hit 4-of-7 3-pointers in the come back win.

"He didn't really get loose, but he made some tough shots," Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

As a team, Iowa State, who has lost only once at home this season, shot 64 percent from the field and hit 5-of-6 3-pointers in the second half downing the Wildcats. Also assisting in the comeback was sophomore guard Josh Neal, who hit two 3-pointers late in the second half to keep the Cyclones ahead, despite the Wildcats' efforts to come back.

K-State led most of the way, at one point leading by as many as nine, until Iowa State pulled ahead 57-55 on a pair of Sullivan free throws with 6:39 left in the game.

With the Cyclones leading 65-61, senior guard Tim Ellis missed a 3-pointer and Neal hit a 3-pointer from the corner to push the lead to 68-61.

Sophomore forward Marques Hayden would put the Wildcats to within four 64-68, but Neal answered again, draining another 3-pointer and finishing K-State's run at a comeback.

"It was really that one stretch that got away from us," Wooldridge said.

In the first half, the Wildcats controlled the tempo of the game, showing patience on offense and frustrating the Cyclones, causing 13 first-half turnovers. K-State also shutdown Iowa State's transition game in the first half, not allowing a single fast-break point.

"I thought our team played really well defensively and at times, offensively we played extremely well," Wooldridge said.

Junior forward Jeremiah Massey led the Wildcats, scoring 23 points and shooting 75 percent from the floor. Ellis was the only other player in double figures for the Wildcats, scoring 10 points on 4-of-14 shooting. Banged-up senior guard Jarrett Hart scored eight points in 26 minutes.

"We tried to keep him from playing long stretches," Wooldridge said. "We hope he can recover in the next couple of days."

The Wildcats were without freshman guard Dez Willingham, who sat out after re-injuring his shoulder against Colorado.

K-State will be at home Saturday to take on the Missouri Tigers.

NFL | USC's Williams to enter NFL draft

Southern California sophomore Mike Williams will enter the NFL draft, the first player to take advantage of the court ruling in the Maurice Clarett case.

Williams

"Mike made his decision that he wants to go to the NFL," USC coach Pete Carroll said Wednesday. "We're disappointed that we're losing him because he's had a terrific two years for us. But we're anxious to watch him in the NFL."

Williams, a 6-foot-5, 230-pound wide receiver, indicated after USC beat Michigan in the Rose Bowl that he planned to remain in school. The Trojans were the Associated Press national champions.

Clarett, a star Ohio State running back, went to court to challenge an NFL rule preventing players less than three years out of high school from entering the draft.

Williams had 1,226 receiving yards and 16 touchdown receptions last season.

He is expected to be a high first-round pick in April's draft.

NHL | Sather steps down as Rangers coach

Glen Sather stepped down Wednesday as coach of the slumping New York Rangers, staying on as president and general manager of a team likely to miss the playoffs for the seventh consecutive season.

Assistant coach Tom Renney was promoted to interim coach, and assistants Terry O'Reilly and Ted Green will remain on the staff.

With 20 games remaining, it appears the Rangers will miss the playoffs. They are in 12th place in their conference, 14 points behind the eighth-place New York Islanders.

MLB | Gonzalez will arrive late to Royals

Juan Gonzalez, the Kansas City Royals' top free-agent acquisition in the offseason, will be a late arrival at spring training.

Gonzalez

Position players were to report Wednesday, with the first full-squad workout set for Thursday. But Royals' general manager Allard Baird said Gonzalez would not arrive until Thursday and his first workout would be Friday.

"It is not an overly concerning issue or anything like that," Baird said Wednesday. "I spoke to his agent and Juan has family issues that he's dealing with. I don't want to go into details out of respect for Juan.

Gonzalez signed a $4.5 million contract for 2004 with the Royals, and it includes an option for the 2005 season.

The 34-year-old Gonzalez is a two-time American League MVP, but was hampered by injuries during the past two season with the Texas Rangers, playing in 82 games last season and only 70 in 2002.

Gonzalez is the only player on the Royals' 40-man major league roster not yet in camp.

Testament of faith

Mel Gibson's version of Gospels depicts physical reality of Crucifixion of Christ

"The Passion of the Christ"
★★★★☆
Movie review by Christopher Harrop

Illustration by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

Not since Martin Scorsese's "The Last Temptation of Christ" has a film about Jesus aroused the minds and emotions of the public as director Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ."

The film is a testament to Gibson's uncompromising faith and ability to derive astonishing performances from his actors with little dialogue and lots of physicality.

The films opens as Jesus confronts Satan's insistence that Jesus cannot bear the burden set before him alone. The viewer sees Judas before the high priests, receiving 30 pieces of silver for leading the soldiers to the garden of Gethsemane.

With the capture of Jesus, the audience is introduced to Mary (Romanian actress Maia Morgenstern) and Mary Magdalene (Monica Bellucci, "The Matrix Revolutions"), both roles Gibson gives significant time, yet not much dialogue.

Morgenstern and Bellucci are relegated to tearful onlookers until the final scenes, in which their performances begin to convey the emotional weight of the situation. Every tear shed and gasp uttered becomes painfully poignant in the final 20 minutes of "The Passion."

The role of children is particularly demonic, from Jesus' appearance before Caiphas to Judas' suicide. As violent as the film is, the most jump-in-your-seat frightening moments come when children are on screen.

The majority of the film is an excruciatingly detailed account of the scourging of Jesus once he is brought before the Romans.

James Caviezel, who plays Jesus, is given very little dialogue, but his performance – physical in nature – is intense and hits every note necessary. While it is obviously Caviezel on screen, viewers will find it hard to discern between fact and cinematic fiction while seeing the slashed back and bloodied eyes the camera captures.

Aside from the staggering lead performance given by Caviezel, "The Passion" devotes tremendous weight to the decision Pontius Pilate faces once Jesus is brought before him.

Bulgarian actor Hristo Shopov, presenting a calm demeanor against the screams, cries and painful shrieks of most other actors, provides the deepest performance of the film.

Aiding the character depth of Pilate is wife Claudia, portrayed by Claudia Gerini ("Under the Tuscan Sun"). At Claudia's persistent warning, Pilate is a reserved and calculative judge – ultimately absolving himself of the matter and avoiding political fallout.

This particular retelling of the Gospel is boosted by the androgynous portrayal of Satan by Italian actress Rosalina Celentano ("The Order"). Satan is eerily reminiscent of the cloaked Death of Ingmar Bergman's "The Seventh Seal."

As Jesus carries the cross through the streets, the camera follows Mary as she follows her son, along with Satan lurking through the raucous crowd. From Satan's first appearance in the garden of Gethsemane to the descent into Hell, the performance is brooding, without being overbearing.

The film's haunting score, by composer John Debney ("Dragonfly"), strikes a horror-like tone as Jesus confronts the knowledge of his betrayal by Judas. Later, it gives way to the monotonous scourging at the hands of the Romans, only to mournfully soar with Jesus' death on the cross.

While Gibson excels in most aspects of the film, he and fellow screenwriter Benedict Fitzgerald do not approach "the greatest story ever told" with enough emphasis on Jesus' life before his trial and crucifixion.

While most audience members are familiar with the Gospel – Christian or otherwise – Jesus' death on the cross does not carry as much emotion cinematically without the understanding of his life a viewer could receive by reading the Bible.

This is not to say the film is devoid of images of Jesus before his capture in the garden of Gethsemane. The film cuts between scenes of the final hours of Jesus' life with six significant flashbacks, including the Sermon on the Mount.

What keeps "The Passion" from elevating into the upper echelon of religious films through the ages is Gibson's repeated use of slow-motion shots to emphasize the brutality visited upon Jesus. The violence itself is not sadistic, but the manner in which it is presented is.

The sheer enormity of the suffering shown on screen accomplishes Gibson's goal without the stylistic slow shots. The audience already is made witness to the severity of the punishing and relentless scourging of Jesus.

In this respect, Gibson fails at attaining the level of high art through the film at face value, but rather through his courage as a director to present this version of the Gospel.

Gibson's courage comes in his insistence on the film's use of Aramaic and street Latin for the characters' dialogue.

While the historical accuracy of "The Passion" ultimately hinges upon the viewer's individual religious beliefs, the film is strengthened by the use of the most likely languages spoken in that time and place.

As one man's deeply-held vision of the final hours of Jesus of Nazareth, "The Passion of the Christ" is a towering accomplishment that is a wonder to behold. As an artistic attempt at historical accuracy, the film has its failings.

If the film is one thing, it is a cinematic work that should be visited and pondered by many before it is labeled as a precipitant to anti-Semitic thought.

"I wish they had focused on the life and amazing ministry Jesus shared with people. People know he suffered a terrible death, but people die horrible deaths every day, and Jesus would want us to focus on them instead," Pastor Jayne Thompson of Lutheran Campus Ministries said.

Opinions on whether the movie was violent exposed mixed opinions as well.

For some, it was unbearable.

"You can't describe it. The violence was extremely intense, and I almost had to get up and leave," Suzie Carroll, junior in pre-journalism, said.

Patience Sama, junior in biochemistry, said the violence was just a true account.

"It wasn't violent. It was just a portrayal of the truth," she said.

Other movies also have portrayed violence in history.

"The movie 'Saving Private Ryan' was also a very violent movie, but it, too, shows how history was and shows that that event was indeed very real," Bob Linder, distinguished professor of history said. Linder also teaches a course on the history of Christianity.

In the weeks before the movie was released, speculation surfaced as to just how accurately the movie stuck to the Gospels in the Bible.

"The movie stuck to the scriptures and truthfully portrayed the most brutal crucifixion ever seen," said Rick Marrs, Pastor of the Emanuel Lutheran Church in Junction City.

Straying away from the violent aspect of the movie, many said they hope the movie will strike a positive effect on culture.

"If Christians are influenced to live like Christians, then the movie has had a positive impact on society that way. Either way, it will make you think about it, and that is always a good thing," Linder said.

John McCulloh, professor of medieval European history, said he can see the movie having the potential of provoking negative feelings.

"If this movie has an impact on our culture, my fear is that it would be a turning point in the history of tolerance in the U.S. and stimulate anti-Semitism," he said.

The movie has drawn anger from Jewish groups, who believe Gibson's movie blames the Crucifixion of Christ on the Jews.

"Since there is so much emphasis on the violence in the movie, that may stimulate anti-Jewish feelings more so than any other film," McCulloh said.

Weber said, however, the movie could advance already held beliefs.

"If a person is already anti-Semitic, then they will find anti-Semitism in the movie somehow. If not, it's not going to change their view," he said.

From anti-Semitism views to extreme gore, much of the public sees the violent nature of the movie to be a response to what our culture demands in movies these days.

"Our culture is addicted to violence. We are constantly bombing and hating people because of their differences. How will this movie help release such addiction?" Thompson said.

From the news media hype trailing the movie's opening to the debates spun from the religion and violence portrayed, Marrs said he sees only one explanation for the film, a view Pope John Paul II has shared: "It is as it was."

P. Diddy cleared of charges of assault on Roger Mills

Singer/songwriter P. Diddy was cleared of assault charges brought on by Roger Mills after the talk show host accused the musician of beating him.

P. Diddy

Mills claimed that after he asked P. Diddy about the rapper's involvement in the murder of Christopher "Notorious B.I.G." Wallace, P. Diddy and his entourage broke a camera in the studio and proceeded to rough up Mills.

A court in Detroit, however, found P. Diddy innocent of the charges and dropped the case on Tuesday.

In a written statement, P. Diddy said he didn't recall the alleged incident ever taking place.

Basinger, Baldwin battle custody without media

A judge on Monday granted requests from former husband-and-wife actors Alec Baldwin and Kim Basinger that the media stay out of the couple's custody battle over their daughter, Ireland.

Basinger

The judge cleared the courtroom of all reporters, saying he believed the media attention on the custody battle would have an adverse effect on Baldwin and Basinger's daughter.

The couple was married in 1993 and divorced in 2001, after a year-long separation. As it stands now, Basinger has custody of the child, while Baldwin has visitation rights.

Baldwin is in the spotlight this weekend as a contender for Best Supporting Actor for his role in "The Cooler," starring William H. Macy. Basinger, meanwhile, will appear in the thriller "Cellular," to be released in May.

Amish reality show

Cable network UPN is under fire from protesters and politicians who don't want to see its latest reality show come to fruition.

The show focuses on teenagers from an Amish community who go to the big city to enjoy all it has to offer.

Rep. Joe Pitts of Pennsylvania said the show would stand as a "mockery" to the Amish communities he serves, and he likened the concept of such a series to circus sideshows.

Network representatives have said they have nothing but respect for the Amish and don't wish to exploit them.

A similar concept that drew anger from groups was unveiled last year as "The Real Beverly Hillbillies," a show that would follow the transition of an Appalachian family to Beverly Hills.

The project is still under way.

Ted Nugent admits to fathering child

Rock star Ted Nugent has admitted to fathering a child out of wedlock with a Dover, N.H., woman.

Nugent

The woman, 43, is suing Nugent, 55, for child support funds and for custody of the child. The child, who has never met his father, is now 8 years old.

In January, Nugent made it clear he was going to contest the lawsuit. He filed a petition Jan. 6 for a court to review the suit.

Nugent, whose music rose to popularity in the 1970s, already has four children with his wife, Shermane Nugent. Nugent recently was voted Father of the Year at his children's school.

Student should not be suspended for copy of swimsuit issue

WES MARFIELD

For 40 years now, the middle of February has been highly anticipated for readers of Sports Illustrated.

Known for its action photography, the magazine takes that to a new level each year with its swimsuit issue.

The typical reader of SI is a middle-aged man who spends his life watching sports from a La-Z-Boy. The only exercise for this everyday Joe comes from lifting 12 ounces at a time.

So when February rolls around, life can't get much better for sports fans as we break up with our favorite teams for a few days to ogle at scantily-clad women and wish we could be photographers.

But this year, things took a turn for the worse.

Justin Reyes, a sixth-grader from Belpre, Ohio, has been suspended from school for three days for bringing a copy of the swimsuit issue to school.

Back in my day, you were only suspended if you got into a fight with someone. Unless he used the magazine to pummel someone seriously enough to warrant medical attention, his punishment is nuttier than squirrel turds.

Mind you, he was offered an alternative punishment: spending two days in school for kids with discipline problems. Imagine that scenario playing out.

Juvie No. 1: What are you in for?

Juvie No. 2: I cold-clocked my teacher with a baseball bat.

Juvie No. 3: I put our pet guinea pig in a microwave.

Reyes: I, uh, brought a swimsuit issue to school.

Let the beatings begin.

Sure, bringing a swimsuit issue to school probably wasn't the smartest idea for a sixth grader. But kicking him out of school for three days won't solve a thing.

He's a sixth grader, so his parents will most likely leave him home alone. His mother agreed with the school that the crime was bad, but said the punishment options were unfair.

And I would put money on the fact that she is too busy to take three days off work to stay home with her son.

So, little Justin will most likely be spending his three-day vacation from class looking at the aforementioned swimsuit issue.

Who knows, with the Internet only a click away, he could make his way into the harder stuff – Playboy, Penthouse or whatever else weirdos put online.

I can understand the school's concern – what Reyes did was inappropriate.

He shouldn't have tried to impress his friends by showing them pictures of women wearing nothing but body paint.

But suspending him from school is about as smart as the NBA giving Lamar Odom an all-expenses paid trip to Amsterdam.

The swimsuit issue has definitely gotten more risqué over the past 40 years, but it is still considered a classy publication.

Men and women both write letters to SI complimenting it for carrying on the tradition, while keeping it tactful.

If you do have a problem with the magazine, send SI a letter. Organize a boycott or figure out a way to get your congressman to take action on the issue.

But whatever is done, taking it out on a sixth grader was definitely the wrong thing to do.

WOMEN | Ohlde breaks K-State career scoring mark against Iowa State

However, Iowa State refused to give up.

The Cyclones responded to K-State's opening surge with a 16-6 run of its own and ended the half trailing 31-22.

The Wildcats started the second half with an 18-2 run to build 49-24 lead.

Iowa State was 1-of-11 to start the half and finished the game shooting 25 percent, including a frigid 1-for-17 effort from downtown.

After the game, the Cyclones' junior forward Lisa Kriener said the team simply had a bad night.

"We just couldn't find the basket tonight," Kriener said.

"We were way off all night. It's tough when you can't make baskets and only muster 33 points."

Iowa State coach Bill Fennelly gave credit to the Wildcat defense that held his team to its lowest point total in his nine-year era.

"We picked a terrible night not to play as well as we could have. K-State did a lot of great things to us. In this league, if you don't make shots, you don't have a chance."

The Big 12 title is now K-State's to lose, and Ohlde and her teammates expect Sunday's game against the Longhorns to be tough.

"I think its going to be a fun game," Ohlde said. We know it is going to be tough to play at Texas. It is a fun matchup and we have the rest of the week to prepare for it. When Sunday rolls around we have to stay true to who we are and take care of business."

DEFENSE | Wildcats switch focus to No. 5 Texas after win Wednesday

Those two figures alone add up to Iowa State's exact total team production in the 40 minutes of play.

"I like the intensity that we brought," Patterson said.

"We want to be intense throughout the course of the game. If you don't do that, you'll find yourself in a real mess, real quick.

"You've got to stay tight in your game or else someone will be knocking on your door real quick."

Life does not get any easier for the Cats as they travel to the University of Texas to take on the No. 5 Longhorns on Sunday and finish the season back home Wednesday, March 3 taking on No. 8 Texas Tech.

Both contests will be filled with Big 12 Championship implications.

"We are ready to take on the next challenge on the road and we understand it will be a challenge," Patterson said.

"We have to be prepared for one of the best, if not the best, team in the country as of late. That is what Big 12 basketball is all about. We will approach these games with a great deal of diligence."

UPC sponsors night of jazz

By Stephanie Swoboda
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The jazz scene at K-State is livening up a bit thanks to the new Thursday Night Buzz sponsored by the Union Program Council.

"The program is meant to be a laid-back program that will expose students to a diverse amount of art and entertainment," Dana Watts, UPC program adviser, said.

The atmosphere in the new coffee shop Thursday night oozes with a jazzy feel, missing only the cigarette smoke and flapper girls. Students are invited to come and hang out with friends, study and enjoy the program, which will usually be based on jazz music, but not always.

Laura Osteen, assistant director of the K-State Student Union, said they also have plans for poetry, comedians and one-person plays.

UPC and the Black Student Union are sponsoring tonight's Thursday Night Buzz, which will include BSU's Lyricist Lounge Cultural Coffee House, which is part of their activities for Black History Month.

Lyricist Lounge will feature performer Jive Poetic, a spoken word artist who has appeared on programs such as HBO's Def Poetry Jam, as well as students who want to display their artistic abilities.

Poetic will perform at 7 p.m. with the Manhattan Jazz Project until 10 p.m. to start the Thursday Night Buzz part of the evening.

Guitarist Mike Katzif, senior in jazz studies, plays for a small crowd at Union Station on Feb. 12. Katzif is a member of the Manhattan Jazz Project, which has been together for three years and is made up of K-State students.

Natalie Rolfe, BSU president and senior in mass communications, said BSU was contacted by Poetic, who wanted to speak on campus.

"We wanted to do something new and different," Rolfe said.

"The coffee house scene is really popular around the country and we thought we could incorporate it into Black History month as one of our activities."

Watts said UPC works to present a diversity of events.

"We hope to present a diversity of acts over the course of the semester," she said. "I would encourage people to come check it out."

FBI agents destroyed evidence from Oklahoma City bombing

By John Solomon
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – FBI agents destroyed evidence and failed to share other information that raised the possibility that a gang of white supremacist bank robbers may have assisted Timothy McVeigh during the Oklahoma City bombing, according to documents never introduced at McVeigh's trial.

Both the FBI supervisor who ran the Oklahoma City investigation and the veteran agent who was in command at the bombing scene say the new evidence, detailed in documents obtained by the Associated Press, is serious enough to warrant reopening the inquiry nine years later.

The evidence, never shared with Oklahoma City investigators or defense lawyers, includes documents showing the Aryan Republican Army bank robbers possessed explosive blasting caps similar to those McVeigh stole and a driver's license possibly stolen during the bombing plot.

"If the evidence is still there, then it should be checked out," said Dan Defenbaugh, the now-retired FBI chief of the McVeigh investigation who reviewed the documents at the request of AP.

"If I were still in the bureau, the investigation would be reopened."

Danny Coulson, the FBI scene commander for the Oklahoma bomb site, agreed.

"There is some unanswered questions here. A lot of things happened that were inappropriate," Coulson said.

"I think it needs to be reopened, but I don't think it should be reopened by the FBI. It needs to be a special investigator, a lawyer, totally independent. He needs to have subpoena power and the ability to use a grand jury."

The agents said there could be plausible explanations for each piece of evidence – blasting caps are plentiful and the bank robbers were experts in identification fraud – but those questions need to be answered.

The investigative documents obtained by AP also shed new light on evidence the Justice Department did not introduce at McVeigh's 1997 trial, including that McVeigh may have sought to recruit additional help around the time he called a white supremacist compound in Oklahoma where several of the bank robbers stayed.

For instance, an FBI headquarters teletype stated McVeigh called the compound on "a day that he was believed to have been attempting to recruit a second conspirator to assist in the OKBOMB attack."

The April 19, 1995, bombing killed more than 160 people and McVeigh was put to death for it in 2001.

His co-defendant, Terry Nichols, will stand trial in Oklahoma next week on state charges that could carry the death penalty.

Peter Langan, one member of the robbery gang, told the AP he plans to testify at Nichols' trial and federal prosecutors several years ago offered and withdrew a plea deal for information he had about the Oklahoma City bombing.

The gang "had some liabilty problems as it related to Oklahoma City," Langan alleged in a phone interview from federal prison where he is serving life sentences for a robbery spree involving nearly two dozen Midwest banks in the 1990s.

Langan said at least three fellow gang members were in Oklahoma around the time of the bombing and one later told him that they had become involved.

McVeigh's ex-lawyer, Stephen Jones, said government officials "simply turned their backs on a group of people for which there is credible evidence suggesting they were involved in the murder of 160 people."

FBI and Justice Department officials declined comment, citing the upcoming trial.

War horses to perform in Bramlage

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

War horses will gracefully invade Bramlage Coliseum tonight.

For the first time since 1994, the Lipizzaner Stallions will be performing at Bramlage.

Gentry Horigan, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said she saw the Lipizzaner Stallions when they last came to Manhattan. She said it was a very entertaining performance.

"They're really incredible, especially if you appreciate horses," Horigan said. "The stuff they do is incredible. They synchronize all of their movements to music.

"They do a thing called Airs Above the Ground, where they jump in the air. It's really cool and fun to watch."

Horigan said she has had horses since she was 9, and she rides for the equestrian team. But, she said, the performance is great no matter your interest in horses.

"These horses are bigger, more powerful and very intelligent," Horigan said. "I think they train the horses for seven to eight years before they perform."

Summer Hamil, sophomore in finance, said her equestrian teammate, Horigan, is taking her to see the Lipizzaners for her birthday.

She said she is excited to go because she admires horses and has heard good things about the Lipizzaner Stallions.

"They're able to do a lot of unique movements," Hamil said. "They're special because of the different training that they go through.

"These horses are really good at their movements; it's like how some dogs are better at hunting, these horses are bred for these abilities. I'm hoping to learn a lot more about them on Thursday."

Master of Ceremonies Troy Tinker said spectators will enjoy the tradition this performance brings.

"You will see 13 beautiful horses and 11 skilled riders," Tinker said.

Courtesy art

"There will be precision drills and big battle maneuvers, like the Airs Above the Ground, that made the Lipizzaners the horses of choice for centuries."

Tinker said the horses have Spanish blood, but were originally bred in Croatia. He said the size of the horse is what allows them to perform the way they do.

"It was in Croatia where they imported Spanish horses and bred them with the horses they had there," Tinker said. "They knew they had something different and called them the Lipizzaners, named after the area they're from.

"These horses are bigger, which make them better at balancing than other horses. They aren't a race horse, which are longer, but they were bred as war horses."

The work crew at Bramlage will have a big workload to prepare the floor for the stallions, said Jim Muller, manager of operations for K-State athletics. He said they have to take down the basketball court and put it back within 48 hours.

"For this production, we have to remove the floor Wednesday night after the women's basketball game," Muller said. "We have a crew of about 20 people who will remove everything.

"We should have the floor out in about four hours, and the horses should arrive around midnight."

Muller said the performance will be a great chance to see this rare breed of horse. He said the show is fitting with the nature of our community.

"They're very beautiful horses with an incredible routine and history," Muller said. "We're expecting a crowd of at least 2,000 people.

Stallion terms

Airs Above the Ground: A series of maneuvers in which the horse leaps above the ground (with or without a rider). These include the Capriole, Courbette and Levade.

Capriole: The horse finds his tempo, leaps into the air, draws his forelegs under his chest and at the height of elevation, kicks out violently with the hind legs.

Courbette: The horse balances on the hind legs and then jumps, keeping the hind legs together and the forelegs off the ground.

Croupade: The jump is similar to the Capriole, but in this maneuver, the horse tucks both his fore and hind legs under his body at the height of elevation.

Levade: The horse must maintain a haunched position at a 45-degree angle to the ground, requiring muscle control and balance that is most difficult to perfect.

Russian orchestra featured at McCain

By Sarah Korwin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sounds of Russian music will fill the halls of McCain Auditorium when the Moscow State Radio Symphony Orchestra comes to K-State.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said his goal of bringing such artists to the campus is to make others more culturally aware.

"We try to bring artists whose performance will enrich the cultural experience of K-State students," Martin said.

According to a press release, the Moscow Orchestra was founded in 1978 to give radio concerts. Its popularity led it to record for film and television. Its also had a subscription series in Moscow, and began to tour internationally. It had a 34-city American tour in 1999, but this will be its first time performing at McCain.

Martin said he encourages students to go hear the Moscow Orchestra and said the performance "gives students a chance to relax."

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain, said he agreed.

"Students should want to do something different, out of the mainstream."

According to the McCain Web site, the principal conductor, Sergey Kondravashev, will lead the orchestra in playing Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien," Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 3" and Rachmaninov's "Symphony No. 2."

"The third movement from the Rachmaninov piece is borrowed by Billy Joel for his song 'Never Gonna Fall in Love Again,'" said Bruce Gbur, an assistant professor of music who is giving the pre-performance lecture.

The Moscow State Radio Symphony Orchestra will be performing a repertoire K-State has not had in more than 20 years.

The orchestra is comprises conservatory-trained musicians who have a special relationship to the music they will play.

"Except for the Beethoven piece, it is their music," Martin said. "It is like an American orchestra playing American compositions."

These musicians have lived with the music, which will be discernible in the quality of it.

Gbur said the musicians understand the style of the music, since they have grown up with the Russian folk music paralleling Rachmaninov's melodic ideas. Martin said he agreed.

"The Moscow Orchestra will demonstrate a difference in ability – not only in technique, but also in interpretation."

Since these musicians are professionals, the performance will be different from the K-State Orchestra. McCain is rarely able to book a full-sized orchestra.

Its performance will be preceded by a lecture from Gbur at 6:30 p.m. in McCain 105.

His lecture is about the pieces the orchestra will play and the composers.

In particular, Gbur will focus on Rachmaninov's relationship to religious and Russian folk music. Students are encouraged to attend the lecture, and Gbur will take questions at the end of it.

"It is a unique opportunity for audiences to hear Russians play Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninov," Gbur said.

DEBATE | Candidates discuss technology, tuition

Conner said she was not optimistic about K-State's financial situation.

"The outlook is bleak based on the budget the governor gave us," she said.

Conner and her running mate, Jeremy Sandall, senior in industrial engineering, were upset about what she called the governor's "unfunded mandate" calling for a 3 percent faculty salary increase.

Hill said he was appalled by Sebelius' budget proposal.

"The most disturbing thing is that she does not say where the money goes," he said.

Hill said he has spoken to Sebelius about the issue and, along with his running mate, Thomas Stein, sophomore in business administration, has been involved in dealings with the state government.

While he would not have direct control over tuition, he said he would continue efforts to allocate funding to assist students in counteracting tuition increases.

Urkevich said her experience as privilege fee chair will help her in working with the governor's budget.

She said the issue would affect students more than the loss of funding for places like Lafene Health Center, because those services would have to come to Senate to receive the funds to compensate for losses.

"Our tuition was being spent to improve our university; now it's going to cover the budget shortfalls."

Urkevich and her running mate, Erik Ankrom, senior in management, said students have more say in tuition than some think.

Pence said the budget issue boils down to one of her campaign issues – empowerment.

She said the student body president has no formal control over tuition, but events like State Education Day are not attended by enough students to effect real change.

She and her running mate, David McCandless, senior in political science, attended the event in Topeka on Monday.

TECHNOLOGY

Technology is one of the main platforms of Procter's campaign.

He said two main factors of their technology plan are the student scheduler, which is a program used by Iowa State University and others to help balance activities with school.

Procter said his campaign is also built around the concept of eAdvising, a program providing students with advising help via the Internet.

He also said the new wait-list system put into motion by Student Body President John O'Hara, can be seen sooner than expected if students are committed.

Huschka said their campaign does not focus as much on issues like the new online wait list system, because it is already in the works.

Conner's campaign includes the implementation of an online database for teacher and course evaluations.

Conner and Sandall also advocate the creation of a student portal, an online marketplace with various features and amenities.

"Our portal plan is the only one recognized by iTAC as feasible," she said.

Conner said there are huge disparities among colleges on the issue of the online wait list, and her campaign would work to close those gaps.

Hill said his campaign would support continuing past actions on the issue of an online wait list system.

"It would be difficult to start something new at this point," he said.

Technology is also a very important facet of Urkevich's campaign.

The Student Information Portal System that she advocates is similar to the one being worked on by the university, she said.

She said their proposal would cost significantly less than the university's proposal and would be ready by the start of the 2004-2005 school year, rather than 2007 when the university's proposal is slated for arrival.

Urkevich said her campaign also advocates the creation of online teacher evaluations.

Pence also said, as part of her Empowerment platform, that the minutes for each Student Senate meeting would be posted on the Internet so that students can be involved to a greater extent in the process.

"The greatest challenge facing us today is student apathy," she said. "SGA allocates $10.5 million. That's a lot of money, and students need to know that."

HAITI | UN considers action against rebels' uprising

He said they recommended the proposed zone be secured by troops from the United States and other nations willing to contribute forces.

In a statement issued after the meeting, the White House made no commitment to do anything other than consider the lawmakers request.

"They had a positive discussion about their shared concern for the Haitian people," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said. "Humanitarian assistance for the Haitian people is a priority and we continue through our relief agencies to make sure that aid is getting to those who need it."

Officials said discussions began at the United Nations on the possibility of an international police force being sent to Haiti to enforce a settlement.

Any such force would need the protection of outside troops, particularly to ensure their safety upon arrival in Haiti.

The U.N. General Assembly was expected on Thursday to discuss ways of achieving a settlement.

The United States and France have been working together on the Haitian crisis since it began earlier this month.

De Villepin said in a statement that the civilian force France is proposing for Haiti "would be charged with assuring the restoration of public order and support actions in the field of the international community."

Senate advances Sebelius' education budget

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' plan to raise $304 million for school districts through higher taxes advanced Wednesday to final action in the Senate, where passage was viewed as unlikely.

The package would phase in a series of increases in taxes on property, sales and personal income over three years and earmark the revenue for specific uses in public schools.

After more than three hours of debate, senators rejected efforts to amend the plan, including a Democratic proposal reducing the package to one year. Other amendments would have earmarked the money for teacher salaries.

The bill's status appeared to be in doubt at the close of debate, when it failed to be recommended for final action. Majority Leader Lana Oleen, asked the chamber to reconsider the action, which was reversed.

Oleen, R-Manhattan, said she had promised the governor a fair vote on the Senate floor and that several senators wanted to go on record on the bill.

Oleen said she expected the bill to get bipartisan support Thursday, but she declined to make predict the outcome or say how she would vote.

"Stand by," she said, adding that there would likely be other plans to follow based on the tone of the debate.

The first significant school finance debate of 2004 came on the 45th day of the 2004 session. Sebelius unveiled the package during her Jan. 12 State of the State address and spent recent days seeking to build support.

Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, who offered the alternative one-year proposal, said he was encouraged by the debate and the 15 votes his plan received.

"I still believed that the property tax component is one of the biggest obstacles," Hensley, D-Topeka, said.

Republican leaders have been reluctant to act on school finance in light of a December preliminary ruling by Shawnee County District Judge Terry Bullock, finding the state's school formula unconstitutional.

Bullock concluded that the approximately $2.6 billion the state distributes annually to school districts is inadequate by perhaps $1 billion.

Senate Education Chairman Dwayne Umbarger of Thayer said he would continue to work for a package that he and other Republicans could support.

"I'm not giving up," he said.

Sebelius issued a statement saying she was committed to improving school funding this session.
